

*Intellectual Modernism
of
SHIBLI NU'MANI*

AN EXPOSITION OF HIS RELIGIOUS AND POLITICAL IDEAS

Mrs. Mehr Afroz Murad

297.20924
M 89 I
310622

Institute of Islamic Culture
2- Club Road, Lahore.

Marfat.com

INTELLECTUAL MODERNISM OF SHIBLI NU'MANI

AN EXPOSITION OF HIS RELIGIOUS AND SOCIO-POLITICAL IDEAS

MEHR AFROZ MURAD

Note Area
FOREWORD BY
Dr CHARLES J. ADAMS
PROFESSOR AND DIRECTOR
INSTITUTE OF ISLAMIC STUDIES
McGILL UNIVERSITY, MONTREAL

INSTITUTE OF ISLAMIC CULTURE
CLUB ROAD LAHORE (Pakistan)

297.20924
M 89 I
310622

ALL RIGHTS RESERVED

Title: Intellectual Modernism of Shibli Nu 'mani

Author: Mehr Afroz Murad

Edition: 2010

Copies: 500

Printed at: Maktaba-e-Jadeed Press, Lahore

Price: Rs. 220.00

This book has been published by Kazi Javed, director of the Institute of Islamic Culture, Lahore in collaboration with the Pakistan Academy of Letters and the Department of Information and Culture, Government of the Punjab.

074 Institute of Islamic Culture,

BS 2201 —

REDACTED

TO MY PARENTS

Marfat.com

Foreword

---

The man who is the subject of this book is one of the foremost figures of modern Muslim India but one whose individuality, depth and manysidedness have yet to be properly appreciated. At once a scholar of formidable learning as well as a thinker of independence of mind, he left behind him an extensive body of writings very wide ranging in scope and of great interest. Among them are essays that not only contribute to understanding the man and his age but which are also of much value in themselves and which merit far more attention than they have so far gained. Among the strengths of the present volume is its demonstration of the multi-facetedness of Shibli. Thus, it serves to correct a distorted image by presenting a more rounded view of his imposing personality than was previously available.

Almost every writer on the evolution of the Muslim community in the Indo-Pakistan sub-continent during the past hundred years has found it necessary to devote some pages to a consideration of Shibli and his thought; he is not, however, well known outside the circles of those who have specialised in the study of Indian Islam. The approaches to him in the literature have been dominated by two considerations: (1) the desire to see him in the light of the developments among the Muslims which led to the partition of the sub-continent and the emergence of Pakistan and (2) the desire to assess his contribution to the intellectual evolution of the Muslim community in the modern period more generally, that is, to evaluate the effect he may have had in changing the ways Muslims have thought and acted in regard to their modern situation. In neither of these respects did Shibli make an important mark on his contemporaries, and it is this fact which, perhaps, more than anything else, accounts for the relative neglect he has suffered at the hands of students of Islam in modern India. As the present volume shows with great clarity, Shibli was not actually involved in the political stirrings that began to agitate the Indian Muslim community toward the end of the nineteenth century, nor did his attention focus primarily on the issues that arose from the burgeoning desire among Muslims to rehabilitate the fortunes of the community, socially, economically, politically and militarily. If he is judged from the standpoint of the Muslim nationalism that produced Pakistan, his contribution may appear to be unimportant and his efforts to have been misguided. If he be judged for his stance toward the problems that were central to the heroes of Muslim renaissance in modern times, whether in India or elsewhere, he may be seen as irrelevant or even as obstructive to reform efforts. Most scholarly opinion has viewed him as a partially enlightened conservative, but none the less essentially an upholder of the Islamic status quo in India, laying emphasis upon those of his writings which celebrate the glories of Islamic history and upon the nature of the education offered in the Nadwat al-‘Ulamā’ in contrast to Aligarh. Such judgments are inadequate, principally because they are made according to criteria that do not fit Shibli’s case. In his time Shibli was concerned with matters other than those which subsequent events have raised to the position of first importance. If he is to be understood for what he was and for the values he may have to transmit, efforts must be made to view him in his own terms and to penetrate into the peculiar nature of his own mental set. The present volume is a determined effort to achieve these goals. By going beyond the perspectives characteristic of the majority of scholars, the work has contributed in a substantial way to a more enlightened grasp of Shibli and to a fuller appreciation of his contribution to Islamic thought. It goes far toward righting the balance in the studies devoted to him through underlining his complexity, the highly individual nature of his preoccupations, the variety of his concerns and even the occasional inconsistency of his thought. The result is a more vivid and more valid picture of Shibli as a man.

Intellectual Modernism of Shibli Nu'mānī

Foreword

Intellectual Modernism of Shibli Nu'māni

One of the important emphases that emerges in the work at hand is Shibli's concern with the re-thinking of fundamental Islamic theology. Unlike many other Muslim leaders in recent times, he both recognised and acknowledged a threat to his religious faith from science and the modern intellectual milieu, and also unlike others his response did not come as defensive apologetics but as a creative reconsideration of the Islamic heritage in the light of the problems posed by science. The problem of an adequate theological stance in our difficult age was of deep personal concern to him; the issues were rooted in a keenly felt puzzlement of mind and a genuine personal need to gain a satisfying intellectual grasp of his religious faith. He was thus involved with the philosophy of religion, one of the small group of significant modern Muslim thinkers to have been so. Although one may not be satisfied with Shibli's resolution of the problems he discussed, and that of science and religion in particular, the very fact of a first-rate thinker's having seen the importance of these problems and given himself to energetic thought about them is itself of much significance. This side of his thought deserves greatly increased attention, and hopefully it will serve as a stimulus to others to follow his lead. It is at once an expression of confidence in the strength and richness of the Islamic heritage that enable it to withstand close investigation and adaptation, as well as a demonstration of an inquiring and modern spirit. For Shibli there was no cause for fear in subjecting his Islamic faith to close scrutiny, only the irresistible drive to bring his religious commitments and his intellectual convictions into accord.

Foreword

The debt of the scholarly community to the author of this book is due not only for the first full-length study in English of a compelling personality and for the care and thoroughness with which the work has been done, but also for the liveliness of the style in which the whole is presented. Mrs Murad has achieved a compact presentation of her subject in language that is clear, forceful and readable, making her book a pleasure to read. The keenness of her own mind and the pithiness of her expression as well as her independence in following where her evidence has led her are reminiscent of Shibli himself. Her achievement should be an encouragement to others and a proof of what persistence and hard work will accomplish even when the circumstances in which one must work are not favourable.

CHARLES J. ADAMS

Institute of Islamic Studies
McGill University
Montreal, P.Q.
June 1976

Preface

---

This study of a single individual's share in and contribution to the intellectual developments in modern Indian Islam was originally a Master's thesis submitted to the Institute of Islamic Studies, McGill University, Montreal, Canada, in 1973. It is now being presented to the general readership with very slight changes only. The study assumes much and offers little in the way of a total interpretation of the phenomenon of modernism in Indian Islam, except perhaps that it emphasises the role of ideas in it. Though conceived and executed quite independently of them, the study turned out more and more to corroborate and substantiate, to exemplify and amplify the interpretations (not mutually exclusive) already presented by earlier and worthier students of modern Indian Islam, especially Professors Wilfred Cantwell Smith, Fazlur Rahman and Aziz Ahmad. As it stands now, it is rather an extended footnote to the works of the aforementioned authors in this field. The present writer's only real claim to originality lies with regard to the subject of this study himself. She has studied Shibli Nu'mānī at length in relation particularly to his religious and political writings, and has tried to bring to light, or rather to life, certain moribund aspects of Shibli's manifold intellectual personality. In the process she has been able to present a vastly modified picture especially of Shibli's religious thinking, and has generally shown that Shibli had a much more modern mind than he is usually credited with.

Preface

Before we try and place Shibli within the context of early modern Islam in India, a few words of qualification seem essential. Shibli's was, perhaps more than anyone else's among his contemporaries, a variegated, protean mind. This quality of mind may be attributed to his restless, mercurial soul, to the changing pressures of his times and environs, to the evolution in his thinking or to mere inconsistency in his thought. The fact, however, remains that Shibli is a man difficult to categorise, label and pigeon-hole. Not only were his views undergoing change with the passage of time, but he was quite capable of adopting intellectual attitudes of an essentially different ethos at one and the same time. On the question, for instance, of a proper system of education for Indian Muslims, Shibli ended up by being almost a reactionary reformer, which was a far cry from his earlier, more liberal, views on education. Or, for instance, in his main field of intellectual endeavour, the Islamic past, especially in its cultural-institutional aspect, Shibli remained throughout a romanticising apologist. On the other hand, in matters of theology, law and politics he showed an increasingly realistic, modern liberal tendency. And it is these last three spheres of his thought, or rather the liberal-modernist strands in his overall thinking, with which we have deliberately concerned ourselves in this study. This clarification was necessary in order not only to give due recognition to the various facets of Shibli's thought, but also to avoid an exaggerated impression about the modernism of it. Modernism was merely one, although greatly significant, piece in the mosaic of his thought.

Intellectual Modernism of Shibli Nu'māni

Shibli may not be a modernist through and through, but we contend that, compared to the traditional, the modernist element in his thought is perhaps more characteristically representative of the spirit of his mind. What we are trying to suggest is that Shibli was virtually forced into taking defensive and reactionary positions in certain aspects and at certain levels of his thought. But it was against his grain, and against the liberal progressive spirit of his mental make-up. (Had he been spared the "mordant and derisive" attacks on Islam by Christian missionaries and early Orientalists, and been exposed to Western thought and methodology in pleasanter circumstances, Shibli would have made a much more scientific historian and liberal educationist.) It was some such perception of Shibli's intellectual temperament which made his friend, admirer and critic, Mahdi Hasan, remark that "Shibli was the first Greek born in [Muslim] India". This judgment is sufficiently borne out by Shibli's manifest rationalism, humanism and liberalism in handling the problems of theology, law and politics in Islam. (Indeed, if Shibli had gained direct and frequent access to the European studies in religion and philosophy, he might have improved the quality of his work on Islamic theology. His was an enterprising soul, imbued with that spirit of learning which characterised the early European Humanists. It is a pity that his main source of Western thought was Farid Wajdi or at best a few polemical translations.)

Preface

In spite of the foregoing, Shibli has generally emerged in the minds of Muslim posterity in India as a traditionalist, a defender of Islamic faith and history and the author of Sirat al-Nabi and Al-Fārūq. Even to Smith he is "an example of a fairly conservative mind" or at best an "orthodox rationaliser". This image of Shibli can partly be explained by suggesting, as Smith has done in the case of Shibli's Egyptian contemporary, Muhammad 'Abduh, that the liberal element is only partially incorporated in the finished product of his work, and that his work lacks systematic exposition. Shibli's disciples and devotees also played a large role in building up this image, especially his Boswell, Sayyid Sulaymān Nadwī, who ignored or explained away the liberal, progressive elements, and accentuated the conserdegeneration of Muslim society—except by the remotest implication,—nor was he engaged in remedying social evils and raising moral standards. Shibli was an intellectualist first and an intellectualist last. His interest in educational reform was essentially an extension of his intellectualism; he wanted to produce better Muslim intellectuals. The most superficial comparison of Al-Nadwah with Tahdhib al-Akhlaq will bring out this distinctive character of Shibli's approach.

Intellectual Modernism of Shibli Nu'mani

Smith's thesis that since Islam has been associated with power and success in history, and since the central expression of faith has been societal, therefore it was the community which felt threatened with the loss of power, and therefore the modern problem of Islam was to preserve the community, may be true in most cases, and at a deeper psychological and analytical level in all cases, of modern Muslim group and individual activity. However, it fails to take into account, in tangible terms, the case of a Muslim intellectual like Shibli who was not so much worried about the threat to the community and the loss of power and prestige as he was worried about the truth and validity of his beliefs which were being threatened by modern science. To some modern Muslims, at least, science did not merely represent a new technology and industrial power, something to be acquired. Rather it meant a renewal of the problem of faith and reason, something to be faced—however imperfect their understanding of the implications of science for religion, and thus however inadequate the formulation of their answers to this problem. It is a measure of the importance which Shibli attached to this question—and thus indicative of his somewhat different outlook on the modern problem of Islam—that the number of books and articles which he wrote on theology greatly outnumbered those written on law and were surpassed only by his works on history and literature. Although he took up law as an object of his thought, his attitude towards it appears to be rather negative, while he hardly seems to consider politics a valid field for religious thinking. Its defensive note notwithstanding, Shibli was, to a considerable degree, concerned with the intellectual reformulation of Islam as a faith; he was trying to redefine the contents and methods of faith—primarily under the impact of the West.

Preface

Shibli belonged to a diverse group of Islamic liberals who flourished briefly about the turn of the present century. "There are two major elements from within the past Islamic tradition from which a contribution to liberalism could be drawn: philosophy and Sufism," says Smith. Shibli drew upon both of them for his liberal reinterpretation of Islam. The mere fact that, contrary to the usual practice of Muslim thinkers, Shibli was giving positive importance, within the Islamic scheme of things, to theology as compared to law or politics, is a sufficient indication of what he would seek from within the past Islamic tradition. The formal rationalism of the falāsifah and the mutakallimīn, especially the Mu'tazilites, would naturally be the single most important asset in Shibli's revision of Islamic ideology. The intellectual sufism served more or less the same purpose. It should be noted that Shibli was not a sufi either by training or by temperament, but was attracted by, and made use of, the mystical rationalism of the sufis. Scarcely less liberating influences on Shibli's mind emanated from his being a historian and man of letters and culture. That is the reason why, despite his religious learning, the title of 'ālim' seems somewhat incongruous when applied to him. The nearest medieval parallel to a man of his broad accomplishments would perhaps be an Abbasid or a Mamlūk kātib, not discounting the secular spirit which characterised the class of the kuttāb. In spite of the liberating influences of his personal humanism and his re-embracing of the rationalist strand in the historical tradition, in the present writer's opinion, the direct or "efficient" cause of Shibli's liberalism was the impact of Western thought, to which he was first exposed during his association with Aligarh. (The question of the precise channels of transmission of Western ideas to Shibli is not really important—though there were several such channels—since these ideas and their presuppositions were, so to say, in the air.) Shibli's drawing upon the past Islamic tradition was, we believe, in the way of the "material" or "formal" cause of his liberalism. Very much a man of the present, he had, however, a very strong sense of the past. Like 'Abduh, he "welcomed Western liberalism in fact if not in name, and sought to incorporate it into or harmonise it with Islam". This harmonising, we believe, was fairly creative. Shibli was groping for a new synthesis. He would not merely prove that revealed Islam and scientific reason were mutually compatible but, in the process, would also generate a new evaluation, a new orientation and a new vision of Islam.

Preface

Our choice of Shibli as the subject of this biographical excursion into the intellectual history of modern Indian Islam is warranted by several factors, starting with the assumption that perhaps no other history will lend itself to biographical treatment more suitably and fruitfully than the history of ideas. To begin with, it was prompted by sheer fascination with his colourful and complex personality which stood out in a group of extraordinary but basically plain and linear personalities like Sayyid Ahmad Khan, Hali and Chiragh Ali. Perhaps it was this kaleidoscopic and enigmatic quality which led different people to view him differently, atomistically and conveniently as poet, lover, literary critic, historian, educationist, pan-Islamist and mutakallim. But all of them generally missed Shibli the liberal religious thinker. They missed the essential rationalist, humanist impulse of the man which ran particularly through his religious and political thought. Indeed, nobody seems to have taken him seriously as a religious thinker. Characteristically, Smith comes closest to doing this, but even he suffers from the usual Orientalistic obsession with apologetics, which is quite all right, but only up to a point. It should not be allowed to blind us to the streak of creative modernity present in Shibli's thought. Indeed, Aziz Ahmad goes a little bit too far when he declares that "the cast of his mind is essentially medieval". To bring the neglected modernist side of his thought into relief is another reason for our choice of Shibli as the subject of this study.

Intellectual Modernism of Shibli Nu'mani

In point of fact, no aspect of Shibli's thought, and for that matter perhaps even of his life, has yet been studied properly. (A certain Z. 'Umar's Doctoral dissertation on Shibli's romanticism, submitted to London University, may prove to be the exception; but we have not seen it to be able to make a definite assessment.) In English, Smith's treatment of Shibli in Modern Islam in India is perhaps still the best, and Aziz Ahmad's summary of his ideas in Islamic Modernism in India and Pakistan, the lengthiest. One may go so far as to suggest that Western scholarship has generally ignored Shibli, at least in comparison to Sayyid Ahmad Khan and Ameer Ali. The situation at home is just the reverse of it. Shibli has almost totally eclipsed Ameer Ali and vies with Sayyid Ahmad Khan in terms of the attention of local scholarship. This is evidenced by the number of monographs written about him, special issues of journals dedicated to him and even doctoral theses done on him. But this attention is mostly misdirected. It has developed personal, partisan tones instead of evolving into dispassionate inquiries; or it has been wasted on insignificant and trivial matters. This state of affairs was precipitated by Sayyid Sulaymān Nadwī's biographical work on his master, Hayāt-i Shibli, and generally revolved around two themes: Shibli's dissent from Sayyid Ahmad Khan and the Aligarh School and his so-called affair with 'Atīyyah Begam Faydī. Hayāt-i Shibli, an otherwise monumentally informative work, tried to make almost a saint out of Shibli at the expense of Sayyid Ahmad Khan and almost totally suppressed his relations with 'Atīyyah Begam—none of which Shibli would probably approve of if he were living. A number of works appeared to counter these two points, and poor Shibli was turned into a hotbed of passionate controversy. While it would be difficult, perhaps even futile, to make a selection from devotional literature on him, the most representative of the anti-Shibli

Preface

Intellectual Modernism of Shibli Nu'mani

writings are the works by Muḥammad Amin Zubayrī and Shaykh Muḥammad Ikrām, especially their Dhikr-i Shibli and Shibli Nāmah respectively. Ikrām has, however, made amends in his recent Yādgār-i Shibli (Lahore, 1971), a general monograph on the life and works of Shibli. Although a definite improvement on his earlier work both in its scope and treatment, and comparatively balanced in its appraisal of Shibli's character and achievements, it is still rather personal and partisan in its basic approach and undertones. It does not really develop into an inquiry at once dispassionate and sympathetic, except perhaps where it deals with Shibli's works, which constitutes its more significant portion. One would expect a more meaningful and profound treatment of Shibli in the two doctoral dissertations written on him. But one unpublished dissertation, presented by Sakhī Aḥmad Hāshimī to the Sind University in 1966, with the high-sounding title "Shibli Kā Dhihnī Irtiqā," is hardly more than a chronology of his life and writings. The other, published dissertation, Shibli—Ek Dabistān, submitted to Aligarh University around 1945 by Aftab Aḥmad Siddīqī under the title Shibli Awr Un Ki Tasārif, is relatively a better attempt in that it is a topical treatment of various facets of Shibli's literary personality. However, it is superficial and also suffers from the author's devotion to Shibli. Much more valuable are the occasional articles contributed to various journals, especially to the special Shibli issues of Al Bāṣir (1957), Ṣabā' (1958) and Adīb (1960). This dearth of serious writing on Shibli was another factor which prompted us to choose him as the subject of this study. Perhaps it would not be too presumptuous to hope that in conjunction with Ikrām's Yādgār-i Shibli, Z. 'Umar's work on Shibli's romanticism and Anis Ahmad's Ph.D. dissertation on the historical methodology of Shibli and Ameer Ali being prepared for submission to the Temple University, Philadelphia, this brief study will contribute to a more serious and significant discussion of Shibli.

Preface

I owe this study, from start to finish, to four adorable persons, but for whom this study just would not be. It was the ever-ready-to-help Dr Zafar Ishāq Anṣārī, Associate Professor of History, University of Petroleum and Minerals, Dhahrān, who first recommended Shibli as a promising subject for research, and even suggested a preliminary outline of the work. He was also good enough to give a quick look-over to the final draft of this study. If he finds that I have radically digressed from the original scheme, he has only to blame himself for not being around when this study was being done. It was the always-to-the-point Professor Niyazi Berkes of the Institute of Islamic Studies, McGill University, Montreal, who advised me to forget about the life of Shibli and concentrate on his thought. He was also kind enough to discuss with me various problems of a general nature connected with this study. It was the never-give-up Dr Charles J. Adams, Professor and Director of the Institute of Islamic Studies, McGill University, and my research adviser, who waited for such a long time for so small a piece of research. When at last it materialised, he painstakingly went through the first draft of all the three chapters page by page and sentence by sentence. He not only corrected them language-wise, but also suggested a number of improvements in their contents. If I could not fully follow up all these suggestions, it was only because I was too lazy to do it. I still hope to incorporate them in some subsequent revision of the work. It was my not-quite-satisfied husband, Hasan Qasim Murad, who not only helped me render many an Urdu passages into English and generally assisted me in preparing the first draft, but was constantly around to drive me to work. Nevertheless, he believes that I have been rather unfair to Shibli in that I have overstressed the modernist note in his thought. For all I know he just may have a point there. My gratitude to these gentlemen cannot be adequately expressed in words, at least not in a language as alien as English. I am also grateful to Father Bowering, my colleague at the Institute of Islamic Studies, McGill University, and Dr Manzur Ahmad, Associate Professor of Philosophy, University of Karachi, for reading the first chapter and making several valuable suggestions and criticisms.

Intellectual Modernism of Shibli Nu'mani

Preface

The library staff of the Institute of Islamic Studies, McGill University, especially Mr Muzaffar Ali and Miss Salwa Farahian, who went out of their way to help me find books and articles, deserve my especial thanks. Thanks are also due to Mr M. Ashraf Darr who not only edited and marked the script for press in his expert way, but also saw to the printing of the book with his characteristic meticulousness.

But for the financial assistance arranged by the Institute of Islamic Studies, McGill University, only God and Miss Eve Yuile, the efficient Secretary of the Institute, would know from where, it would not have been possible for me to go abroad and do post-graduate research at such a distinguished University as McGill. I deeply appreciate this act of generosity.

I also want to take this opportunity to express my deepest gratitude to my mother who, despite her old age and failing health, took the very best care of my children in Karachi, and made it possible for me to stay in Montreal.

I must also offer thanks to those wonderful people who took active interest in seeing this thesis published: to Dr Adams for suggesting the idea of its publication and consenting to write a Foreword to it; to Dr Manzur Ahmad for introducing it to Professor M. Saeed Sheikh, Director,

Intellectual Modernism of Shibli Nu'mānī

Institute of Islamic Culture, Lahore; and, lastly, to Professor M. Saeed Sheikh for considering it worthy enough to be published by the Institute of Islamic Culture and executing its publication with such care, concern and despatch.

Lastly, a few words about the system of transliteration, bibliography and appendix. The letters of the Urdu alphabet, including the Persian-Arabic letters, are transliterated as follows (in Urdu alphabetical order):

ا	a	ڈ		ض	d	ڑ	m
ب	b	ڏ		ٻ	t	ڻ
پ	p	ڏ	ڏ	ڦ	z	ڙ	n
ت		ت	ر	ع	'	و	w
ٿ		ڦ	ڙ	غ	gh	ه	h
ٿ	th	ڇ	z	ڦ	f	ڦ	,
ج	j	ڙ	zh	ڦ	q	ڦ	y
چ	ch	س	s	ڪ	k	ڪ
ح	h	ش	sh	ڱ	g
خ	kh	ص	s	ڦ	l

The vowels used are a i u (short), ā ī ū (long), ā (alif maqsūrah), 'ā (alif māndūdah); and, for the diphthongs, aw and ay. The Arabic article is transcribed al. The idāfah is indicated by i and tā' marbūtah by ah or at.

The bibliography consists only of the works referred to in the footnotes.

Preface

Since the study does not contain the conventional chapter on the subject's life, it was thought advisable to add a chronological bio bibliography comprising the main events of Shibli's life and his chief works—as an Appendix.

Mehr Afroz Murad

Karachi

1 May 1976

Table of Contents

---

						Page
Foreword, Charles J. Adams	...	...	...	...	...	ix
Preface	...	...	...	...	...	xiv
Chapters
I. Rationalist Theology	...	...	...	...	...	1
II. Changing Law	...	...	...	...	...	57
III. Liberal Politics	...	...	...	...	...	89
Conclusion	...	...	...	...	...	116
Appendix: A Chronological Bio-Bibliography of Shibli	...	...	...	...	...	121
Bibliography	...	...	...	...	...	126
Index	...	...	...	...	...	129

I

---

Rationalist Theology

(1)

“Today we are, as before, in need of a modern theology (‘ilm al-kalām), whereby we should either refute doctrines of modern sciences, or undermine their foundations, or show that they are in conformity with Islam.”<sup>1</sup>

Thus did Sayyid Ahmād Khān respond to the question of the relationship between reason and faith in Islam raised anew with unprecedented acuteness due to the situation—economic-political, psychological-cultural and intellectual-religious—obtaining in India in the last half of the nineteenth century. A new phase of assimilation, rejection and adjustment had begun for Indian Islam, both as a tradition and as a faith. Without denying the partial validity of the argument that a change in material conditions preceded the ideological adaptation and may even have been the cause of it, and without also denying the general truth of the statement that the modern challenge was primarily to the social institutions of Islam, one must recognise

1. Quoted in Fazlur Rahman, Islam, p. 217.

Intellectual Modernism of Shibli Nu'mānī

that on a purely intellectual level problems were also raised for specific religious beliefs of Islam directly by modern Western philosophical and scientific theories. The whole problem indeed was raised to a more general level, whether faith and reason can accommodate one another. These problems had been discussed for centuries in Islam by Muslim thinkers, but had acquired a new dimension and assumed a new quality under the impact of the nineteenth-century rationalism and scientific developments. The conflict was not any longer just between religion and thought, but between religion and scientific thought. The new scientific worldview had its own claims for recognition. This was the problem, both in its specific and general implications, to which Sayyid Ahmad Khān and other late nineteenth-century Indian Muslim thinkers addressed themselves. In so doing they were not so much aiming at producing scientific thought as they were trying to save a situation —to save their religion from the relentless encroachment of modern thought by finding a modus vivendi between the two.<sup>2</sup>

It seems ironic that in Muslim India the first outstanding person to feel the need of a new kalām was Sayyid Ahmad Khān who was himself largely responsible for deliberately introducing Western sciences among the Indian Muslims. What Sayyid

2. Cf. ibid., pp. 214 f.; idem, "Revival and Reform in Islam," Cambridge History of Islam, II, 644-46. See also Nadav Safran, Egypt in Search of Political Community, p. 2.

Rationalist Theology

Aḥmad Khān actually did was that he showed that Islam was in conformity with modern sciences; he did not refute them, nor did he undermine their foundations. The means Sayyid Aḥmad Khān adopted towards that end was essentially to re-interpret the Qur'ān. He laid down certain principles for his tafsīr, the most central of which was that there could not possibly be any contradiction between the work of God (Nature) and the word of God (Qur'ān). If there were such a contradiction between the two, he argued, it would necessarily follow that the word of God is false, since the work of God is undeniably self-evident; and since the word of God cannot be false, therefore both have to be uniform (muttahid).<sup>3</sup> It was perhaps only natural that Sayyid Aḥmad Khān should equate human reason (insānī 'aql), which he regarded as the sole arbiter and harmoniser between the two,<sup>4</sup> with the nineteenth-century European scientists' view of nature and its laws. This in effect meant that Sayyid Aḥmad Khān turned the contemporary scientific worldview into the overriding principle of the interpretation of the Qur'ān. Sayyid's Aḥmad Khān's task of reinterpreting the Qur'ānic concepts and formulating a modern theology may or may not have been made easier by this principle, but it surely cut him loose from the orthodox tradition and drove him to the medieval Muslim philosophers—something which not only cost him in terms of popularity, but also prevented his kalām from becoming the representative expression of Islamic faith.<sup>5</sup> His colleague Shibli, who also felt the need of a new science of kalām, most probably taking his cue from Sayyid Ahmad Khan, tried to propose a different solution to the problem. What was his solution and how far was he successful in his venture?—we shall try to see in the following pages. Shibli expounded his views on the subject mainly in a series of four monographs entitled 'Ilm al-Kalām, Al-Ghazāli, Al-Kalām, and Sawānih Mawlānā Rūm. “Typical of his method, and his whole viewpoint,” the first two and the last works are essentially historical-biographical. In the third he expressly propounds his theology for today.

3. Sayyid Aḥmad Khān, Tahrir fi Uṣūl al-Tafsīr, p. 6.

4. Ibid.

Intellectual Modernism of Shibli Nu'mani

(2)

In conscious disagreement with Sayyid Ahmad Khan as to the nature of the need of a new kalām and, therefore, the nature of the response itself, Shibli in his Al-Kalām starts with a harsh attack on Sayyid Ahmad Khan’s position in these words:

“It is being claimed today that the old philosophy could not destroy religion since it was based on conjectures and

5. Fazlur Rahman, Islam, p. 218; idem, “Revival and Reform in Islam,” op. cit., II, 645 f.; Aziz Ahmad, Islamic Modernism, pp. 41 ff.; W. C. Smith, Islam in Modern History, p. 74.

Rationalist Theology

hypothetical assumptions (giyāsāt awr zanniyāt); but since modern philosophy is based wholly on experiment and observation (tajribah awr mushāhadah), religion cannot survive in opposition to it. This is a common cry which having once arisen from Europe has resounded all over the world. But we must discern carefully the element of fallacy (mughālātah) which has entered into this factuality (wāqi'iyyat).<sup>11</sup>

Shibli then went on to make a distinction between modern science and modern philosophy. He said that the Greek falsafah denoted an aggregate of various disciplines including physics, astrology, theology and metaphysics; but Europe very correctly divided it into two parts: matters which were definitely and indisputably established on the basis of observation and experiment were called science, and those which were beyond the grasp of experiment and observation were called philosophy. Shibli finds no conflict between science and religion. Indeed, according to him, they have nothing to do with each other, their subject-matters and scopes being absolutely separate. How many elements are there? What are the ingredients of water? What is the weight of air, and the speed of light? These and such other matters belong to science and are of no concern to religion, says Shibli. The questions with which religion deals, and which cannot be touched by science, are: Does God exist? Is there another life after death? Is there any reality of good and evil? Is there reward and punishment? The most that even materialist scientists have claimed concerning these things is that since they are outside the realm of experiment and observation, therefore they neither know about them nor believe in them. But "third-rate materialists" and "the shortsighted," Shibli says, "take the non-existence of knowledge to mean the knowledge of non-existence". The confusion arises, Shibli goes on to say, when either of the two, science or religion, steps into the realm of the other. It was such trespass that led to unbelief in Europe where the scope of religion was so much enlarged that no scientific question remained outside its jurisdiction. Consequently, the priests denounced all kinds of scientific inventions and discoveries as acts of heresy and apostasy. Giving a brief description of the Inquisition Shibli concludes that this development was peculiar to Christian Europe where religion was identified with the superstitions of the priests, and knowledge and reality regarded as opposed to it. But Islam, Shibli maintains, is in no such danger, since it had declared in the very beginning that "you are more knowledgeable about the affairs of the world (antum a'lamu bi umūri dunyā-kum)". Despite the widespread practice among Muslims of charging persons with unbelief for petty matters, no one was ever charged with unbelief because of scientific investigations and discoveries. Shibli quotes Shāh Wali Allāh to the effect that the Prophets' only concern is the refinement of morals (tahdhīb al-akhlāq) and they do not involve themselves in explaining natural causation. His conclusion is that the domain of Prophecy is separate from that of nature.<sup>6</sup>

Intellectual Modernism of Shibli Nu'māni

Rationalist Theology

On this somewhat theoretical-cum-historical level, Shibli dealt with the problem of science versus religion and brought Islam forth from the confrontation apparently unscathed. As for philosophy, Shibli maintained that there are scores of mutually disagreeing philosophical schools in Europe today, which sometimes come into conflict with religion. Since, however, they do not propound established truths, they do not constitute any danger for religion. In a lighter vein he suggests that religion might well sit back and watch with equanimity while these schools fight out among themselves.<sup>7</sup>

Once Shibli had dissociated religion from science and put it into the same genre as philosophy in so far as both dealt with matters beyond observation and experiment, all that was required to be done, as the sub-title of his Al-Kalām reads, was to "affirm the tenets of Islam against contemporary philosophy". But this task was easier described than done. In actual practice, he did not—indeed he could not—rest with this stated position. The neat and clear line of demarcation between science on the one hand and religion and philosophy on the other suffered a major shortcoming. Science did not consist merely of observed and tested

6. Al-Kalām, pp. 7-15.

7. Ibid., pp. 7, 11.

Intellectual Modernism of Shibli Nu'mānī

facts, and philosophy was not speculation pure and simple. Science, when it dealt with questions of a general nature, took on the nature of philosophy. Philosophy in turn was deeply impressed by, and in many respects heavily based upon, the results of scientific activity. Whichever way one looked, science was there; and religion, inasmuch as it claimed to be a rational activity, could not remain just a disinterested spectator. Shibli must have been aware of all this since at one place he went so far as to admit that in comparison with Greek falsafah, "the majority of the dicta of modern philosophy are based on realities and actualities".<sup>8</sup> But far more important and interesting is his own advertent or inadvertent blurring of the distinction between science and philosophy. At two different places, he uses the word "philosophy" to include the scientific theories, as we shall presently see. The quarrel was not really about the simple facts of science. Although it was task enough to convince the generality of Muslims as well as the 'ulamā' that the elements had been proven to number more than four and that religion, in any case, was not involved positively or negatively in such matters,<sup>9</sup> this was not the point at issue. The fundamental issue arose where the so-called laws of science or nature, in so far as they proposed, explicitly or implicitly, alter-

8. Maqālāt, VII, 29.

9. Ibid , p. 38 ; Sayyid Sulaymān Nadwī, Hayāt, pp. 390 f.

Rationalist Theology

nate answers to the ultimate questions, became a philosophy and a religion unto themselves and clashed with revelational worldview. Shibli had to define his position with respect to these "laws" if he ever hoped to have religion reinstated and accepted as a rationally respectable system.

He went about his objective in two stages or at two levels. First, he emphasised the element of speculation and uncertainty involved in scientific theorising. At one place he cited the varying opinions of certain European scientists on the nature of the soul as a proof of their speculative character, and then asked rhetorically: "Can it be claimed on the basis of these [opinions] that the modern sciences have proven the soul non-existent?"<sup>10</sup> At another place he expresses himself in these words:

"A very important point is that philosophy, be it ethical, theological, or [pertaining to] perception of the realities of the universe [natural?] is not something sensible and self-evident. The present-day branches of philosophy in the Western countries, though they are easily understandable and more appealing to the mind, are not definite and absolute. The only proof of their correctness and actuality is that their dicta go to one's heart. But if one were bent upon denying them, they cannot be proved by irrefutable evidences. One of the great doctrines of modern philosophy is evolution which is propounded by Darwin . . . ; this doctrine is firmly established according to almost all the philosophers. But all of its proofs boil down to this: the creation of the universe in this particular manner is apparently more reasonable (qarīn-i qiyās)."<sup>11</sup>

10. Al-Kalām, pp. 10 f.

11. Sawāniḥ, pp. 96 f.

Intellectual Modernism of Shibli Nu'māni

But Shibli did not stop here. He went further and questioned the finality of the laws of nature themselves. Have all the laws of nature been determined? Is it certain that the things which we regard as the law of nature are really the law of nature?—he asks.<sup>12</sup> In the same vein he continues elsewhere:

“No doubt philosophy means that one should discover the law of nature, the chain of cause and effect in the whole of universe. But the development of philosophy depends on not being content with the present findings; rather, ever-new investigations should be carried out with a view to knowing if the chain we have affirmed is not wrong and whether there is not another law of nature in its stead.”<sup>13</sup>

Thus, science and philosophy/religion may not be so unconcerned with one another as they were made out to be in the beginning, but Shibli still was able to find a way to avoid the consequences of the intrusion of science into the realm of religion. Briefly put, he discovered the means whereby he could accommodate the supernatural elements in Islam with science or nature. That was perhaps all that really mattered. He had to find a way to explain “scientifically” or “naturally” the “other-worldly” in Islam. Once he did that, Shibli not only surmounted the unsurmountable and crossed the main hurdle on his way to a rational Islam, but also set himself apart from Sayyid

12. Al-Kalām, p. 116.

13. Sawāniḥ, p. 157.

Rationalist Theology

Aḥmad Khān in a rather fundamental way. Sayyid Aḥmad Khān had sacrificed the "irrational" in Islam at the altar of science and nature. Shibli was not prepared to divest Islam completely of its "other-worldliness". Herein lies his only real difference with Sayyid Aḥmad Khān. He had not lost his transcendental touch, or his native style.

(3)

Once he had cast doubt on the certainty and finality of the basic tenet of nineteenth-century science and posited the possibility of what may be called, for want of a better name, a supernatural law of nature, he could have very well pitched Islam against general scientific reason also, and enjoyed almost unlimited scope for imaginative and intuitive speculation and reasoning. But Shibli did neither of these two things. Having secured a "reasoned" place for the supernatural in Islam Shibli showed himself a consistent and devout believer in science and nature. He would not, indeed he could not, disengage himself from the general frame of contemporary scientific or natural reason. He knew, like Sayyid Aḥmad Khān, that, in order to be made acceptable to a modern educated Muslim who had been exposed to this rationalism, Islam had to be shown to stand its test—as far as possible. This indeed should have gone without saying in so far as this was the raison d'être of his new venture in the field of kalām. But there was more to his adherence to science and reason.

Intellectual Modernism of Shibli Nu'mani

The fact is that Shibli was no less an admirer of nineteenth-century science and reason than Sayyid Ahmad Khān was. He was enthusiastic about the scientific spirit of the West, particularly its experimental, inductive method of which he made use at different places to bolster up his arguments.<sup>14</sup> He even accepted, and traced back to Muslim sources, scientific notions such as those of gravity, the atom, the death and rebirth of biological cells, evolution, indestructibility of matter and last, but not least, the natural law of causation.<sup>15</sup> The last mentioned may seem paradoxical in view of what was said earlier on the subject. But that was a reservation Shibli had to make in order to explain the supernatural element in Islam. Otherwise, he was a firm believer in the law of nature and vehemently condemned those who did not believe in it.<sup>16</sup>

It is true that he did not, like Sayyid Ahmad Khān, go so far as to deny the supernatural in Islam in order to make it the religion of nature, a kind of deism fashionable among the scientific circles of the nineteenth-century West. But to Shibli as well Islam was a natural religion in the sense of being in consonance with the tenets of reason 14. See, for instance, Al-Ghazālī, pp. 184 ff.

15. Sawāniḥ, pp. 219-24.

16. See below, pp. 22, 28, 38 f.

Rationalist Theology

and, with the single exception already mentioned, also with the tenets of science or nature. Thus with Shibli reason does not absolutely coincide with science, the former being slightly larger than the latter. It is science which is subsumed under reason and not vice versa. As with Sayyid Ahmad Khan, science and reason still play the most important role in Shibli's theological project, but the order is reversed. In his "natural religion" (diyānah tabī'ah), of which the idea he borrowed, through Farid Wajdi, from certain European writers, reason is given the paramount role in judging the truth of religious beliefs.<sup>17</sup> In fact, Shibli prefaces his actual presentation of Islamic tenets with a brief discourse showing that Islam is the only religion which religiously calls upon man to use his own reason and investigate nature. In this connection, he cites those verses of the Qur'an which enjoin upon man to think intelligently and to study nature as the signs of God.<sup>18</sup> Shibli then goes on to demonstrate that Islamic tenets conform to reason. And in so doing he falls back upon the medieval Muslim kalām.

(4)

In his attempt to show the conformity between Islamic beliefs and reason Shibli turned to medieval Muslim kalām partly because of his historical per-

17. Al-Kalām, pp. 24 f.

18. Ibid., pp. 26-29.

Intellectual Modernism of Shibli Nu'māni

spective and sense of continuity and partly because he thought that the issues of kalām on a purely theological level have not really changed. "That part of old 'ilm-i kalām which is useless today," Shibli writes, "was insufficient before also, and the part that was useful then is useful today also, and will so remain always, since the correctness and actuality of a thing does not alter with the passage of time."<sup>19</sup> Thus Shibli was not ready to throw away the medieval kalām material altogether. He would rather reconstruct 'ilm-i kalām' "according to old principles and new taste".<sup>20</sup> We need not elaborate upon the "new taste," as the meaning is already clear by now. One must, however, add that it also included a "clear and simple style" so that the arguments should be easily comprehensible and appealing. The new style may be compared with the "old method" in which "complex premises, logical terms and very subtle concepts were used, as a result of which the opponent was intimidated and fell silent, but it failed to create a condition of belief and intuition."<sup>21</sup> The question that must be answered is: What did Shibli mean by "old principle"? What part of medieval kalām did he consider useful then and useful now? And for what reason?

Before answering this question we should first find out what precisely were the issues of kalām in Shibli's view. Shibli views medieval kalām as 19. 'Ilm al-Kalām, p. 4.

20. Ibid.

21. Al-Kalām, p. 6.

Rationalist Theology

falling into two essentially different categories which he respectively calls traditional and rational: that which evolved out of the disputation between Islamic sects, and that which was developed to counter falsafah.<sup>22</sup> Shibli concerns himself with the latter, "on whose pattern" he would reconstruct the new science of kalām.<sup>23</sup> Shibli further subdivides the rational kalām into two parts: affirmation of Islamic beliefs and refutation of falsafah, mālahidah and other religions.<sup>24</sup> At two different places he calls each of these two subdivisions, to the exclusion of the other, the essence of 'ilm-i kalām'.<sup>25</sup>

In the first subdivision Shibli includes the following as the legitimate concerns of kalām: affirmation of the Creator, of the Unity of God, of Prophecy, of the Qur'ān as the word of God and of the Hereafter. The rest he regards as irrelevant or inessential. He points out that hundreds of issues which either had nothing at all to do with Islam, negatively or positively, or at least had no essential relation with it, were included among the beliefs of Islam. A large part of the efforts expended in 'ilm-i kalām' was wasted in affirming these beliefs. Among the irrelevant he mentions issues such as whether the attributes of God are, or are not, identical with His essence, whether the Qur'ān is created or uncreated, whether actions

22. 'Ilm al-Kalām', p. 9.

23. Ibid.

24. Ibid., p. 163; Al-Ghazālī, p. 168.

25. 'Ilm al-Kalām', pp. 90, 196.

Intellectual Modernism of Shibli Nu'mani

are part of faith or external to it, etc. Among the non-essentials he mentions those issues which resulted from trying to determine the nature or reality of the invisible world, namely, angelology and eschatology.<sup>26</sup> Although Shibli took a stand on almost all the major issues of the first kind, he never took them up as a feature of his kalām.<sup>27</sup> He did devote, however, a full section to the discussion of issues of the second kind, even though he relegated them to a secondary position.<sup>28</sup>

Shibli would have the second subdivision also drastically curtailed. Though he does not decry the medieval Muslim attempts to refute the religions other than Islam, the fact that he devotes only two and a half pages to describe them,<sup>29</sup> coupled with his subsequent lack of any marked interest in other religions (he mentions their beliefs only incidentally, without turning them into a matter of real dispute),<sup>30</sup> would indicate that he did not regard this line of kalām as important, at least not any more. Indeed, if the fact that he quotes al-Ghazālī to the effect that, except for those who rejected Islam after its reality

26. Ibid., pp. 196 f.; Al-Kalām, pp. 167-71. Also see Makātib, I, 139.

27. For instance, the question of free-will and predestination in Islam: Shibli felt very strongly about it, so much so that eventually he took it up in the Sawānih (pp. 185-94; also see below, pp. 55 f.). But he does not consider it a legitimate concern of kalām and consequently does not include it in his Al-Kalām.

28. Al-Kalām, pp. 167-218. 29. 'Ilm al-Kalām, pp. 163-65.

30. Al-Kalām, pp. 143-67.

Rationalist Theology

had been fully explained to them, all non-Muslims are excusable and God will have mercy on them,<sup>31</sup> is an indication of the trend of Shibli's own mind, he would rather make peace with other religions.

More interesting is Shibli's view regarding the standpoint of kalām vis-a-vis the Greek falsafah. He says: "The mutakallimīn committed blunders [in their refutation of Greek falsafah]; the issues which they thought belonged to Greek falsafah did not really belong to it, and those which really belonged to it were more probably not against Islam."<sup>32</sup> Shibli mentions, on the authority of al-Fārābī and Ibn Rushd, several views which were mistakenly attributed to the Greek philosophers; for instance, that Aristotle and Plato did not believe in reward and punishment, while in fact they did, that the falsafah did not believe in miracles, and that their interpretation of wahy and ru'yā was against Islamic belief, while in fact nothing is reported from them on the subject, etc.<sup>33</sup> Shibli also lists those issues which did concern Greek falsafah, but were mistakenly regarded as being against Islam, for instance, the eternity of the world.<sup>34</sup> Thus, according to Shibli, falsafah or Judaism or Christianity did not really pose a 31. Al-Ghazālī, pp. 291 f.

32. 'Ilm al-Kalām, p. 90; in another place (p. 165): "apparently seemed against Islam"; in yet another place (p. 86): had "no concern" with Islam.

33. Ibid., pp. 166-70.

34. Ibid., pp. 170-73.

Intellectual Modernism of Shibli Nu'manī

problem for the science of kalām.<sup>35</sup> Refutation of the falsafah should not indeed be regarded as proper kalām.<sup>36</sup>

The proper concern and real problem of kalām was the refutation of the atheists (malāhidah) who did not believe in any religion and criticised every religion. Though they were against all the accepted beliefs of Islam, their main target was the Qur'ān in respect to its contents and style and thus its revealed or miraculous nature.<sup>37</sup> This singling out of malāhidah as the number one enemy of Islam was in fact Shibli's justification for going back to the medieval kalām in his quest for new kalām material. "It is surprising," he writes, "that, despite such progress of philosophy today and despite endless increase in the tendency towards shrewdness, fault-finding and scepticism, the objections being made on religious matters now-a-days are not superior in force, subtlety and number than those which the earlier malāhidah made."<sup>38</sup> Thus, what Shibli wanted to do was to affirm the basic Islamic tenets over against the objections of the atheists with the help of the arguments used in the past. But the question still remains:

35. Ibid., p. 174.

36. Ibid., p. 166. He intended to write a separate monograph on medieval Muslim attempts at the refutation of falsafah—as an undertaking in the history of falsafah and not of kalām.

37. Ibid., pp. 174 ff. Shibli wanted to write a separate volume, in his kalām series, on the Qur'ān entitled "Ulūm al-Qur'ān". Al-Kalām, p. 1.

38. 'Ilm al-Kalām, p. 175. See Al-Kalām, p. 40.

Rationalist Theology

which part of the medieval kalām he regarded as useful for that purpose and what did he mean by the "old principles"? The answer lies in learning which of the various schools of kalām and which of the numerous mutakallimīn Shibli preferred to the others and for what reasons.

Shibli may or may not be a neo-Mu'tazilite modernist (or whatever that term means) like Sayyid Ahmad Khān,<sup>39</sup> but he was deadly against Ash'arism. The Ash'arite kalām which had remained arrested and static for centuries and offered a method of argumentation which looked ridiculously unreasonable, especially against the nineteenth-century rationalist background, was not acceptable to him at all. In a sense, Shibli's works on kalām are nothing but a concerted attempt to discredit the basic tenets of Ash'arism, and uphold those of Mu'tazilism. In fact, as we shall see later, his interest in rationalism did not even stop with the Mu'tazilites, but, in several instances, led him to welcome ideas from philosophers and mystics. The beliefs peculiar to the Ash'arites have an appeal, according to Shibli, only to a simple, unquestioning mind in contradistinction to a philosophic, questioning mind which is attracted towards the Mu'tazilite beliefs.<sup>40</sup> The significance of the Ash'arite beliefs, in Shibli's eyes, is merely historical: they are the outcome of the first attempt in Muslim theology by Abū al-Hasan al-Ash'arī to strike a middle course between reason and tradition. Unfortunately, this attempt ended up by being against reason, as is evident in al-Ash'arī's attempt to prove the vision of God and miracles.<sup>41</sup> Yet, with the advent of mutakallimīn like al-Ghazālī there was hope that the defects of Ash'arism would be removed and that it would attain perfection. The Mongol invasion, however, cut its intellectual development short—though unfortunately not its spread.<sup>42</sup> Shibli criticises the characteristic Ash'arite doctrines in these words: “You can judge for yourself who can ever prove such things as that God encumbers with a responsibility which is beyond human capacity (taklīf mā lā yuṭāq), that effects are not related to causes, that body is not the condition of life, that man turns into a donkey by magic.”<sup>43</sup> At another place, criticising the argument of the “superficial Ash'arites” (Ashā'irah-i zāhirīyyīn) in support of the external existence of the invisible

39. Aziz Ahmad, op. cit., p. 83. One really fails to understand what Aziz Ahmad precisely means by the term neo-Mu'tazilite modernist and why would he want to characterise Shibli so very differently from Sayyid Ahmad Khān in this respect. If neo-Mu'tazilite modernism means the adoption of the nineteenth-century natural philosophy lock, stock and barrel, then he is probably right in not regarding Shibli a neo-Mu'tazilite modernist. But if it means adoption of a generally rationalist outlook and scientific worldview, and rejection of Ash'arism, then Shibli ought to be classified along with Sayyid Ahmad Khān.

Intellectual Modernism of Shibli Nu'mani

40. 'Ilm al-Kalām, pp. 11 f.

41. Ibid., pp. 63 f.

42. Ibid., p. 84, and the preceding pages; also p. 161.

43. Ibid., p. 87.

Rationalist Theology

world, Shibli says: "It is these childish arguments and unbounded speculations (ihtimālāt) which have made all the people believe in magic and scores of far-fetched things."<sup>44</sup> Even in the affirmation of the beliefs proper to Islam, such as the existence and Unity of God, Prophecy and the Hereafter, Shibli is in almost total disagreement with the usual Ash'arite method of argumentation, as will become evident later.

Shibli's attraction towards Mu'tazilites' characteristic doctrines must already be evident from his rejection of the parallel Ash'arite doctrines in particular, and Ash'arite methodology in general. However, in view of its unaccustomed nature it seems necessary to document the fact. To begin with, in connection with the political origin of the theological discussions under the Umayyads, Shibli mentions favourably the stand taken by Ma'bad, Ghaylān and Jahm on the question of free-will and predestination.<sup>45</sup> This inclination becomes still more clear where Shibli mentions the Ash'arite and Mu'tazilite beliefs resulting from their respective stands on the question of reason versus tradition. Characterising this question as the real basis of difference between the Ash'arites and the Mu'tazilites, he declares that it is at this point where the boundaries of the arbāb-i zāhir (meaning the Ash'arites) and ahl-i nazar (meaning

44. Al-Kalām, p. 198.

45. 'Ilm al-Kalām, pp. 17-19.

Intellectual Modernism of Shibli Nu'mānī

the Mu'tazilites) become totally apart.<sup>46</sup> Though he disapproves their intolerant attitude under al-Māmūn, he mentions with pride that the Mu'tazilites were mostly Hanafites (he was a devoted Hanafite himself) and also gives a list of early muhaddithīn who were regarded by al-Dhahabī and Ibn Hajar as Qadarites or Mu'tazilites.<sup>47</sup>

Thus, Shibli's sympathy for, and agreement with, the Mu'tazilites was unmistakable. The major issues on which he took up the same views as the Mu'tazilites are: God's commands are always based on reason, justice and goodness; things are possessed of inalienable properties both in moral and physical sense, and there is in operation an unbroken chain of cause and effect in this world; and, finally, man has freedom of will and action. One need hardly re-emphasise the point how necessary it was for Shibli to uphold these views if he wanted to show the reasonableness of Islam in the nineteenth- and early twentieth-century humanistic world dominated by natural rationalism.

The elaborations made above regarding Shibli's pro-Mu'tazilite stance provide us then with part of the answer to our original question as to what Shibli meant by "old principles" and what he regarded as "useful" in the medieval kalām. Part of the answer seems to be indicated by Shibli's appealing to the ideas of Muslim philosophers and mystics or rather philosopher-mytics. The Mu'tazilites were indeed very useful and welcome in so far as they helped counter the absolutely unreasonable and unscientific and God-centred attitude of the Ash'arites and helped to present a reasonable, scientific and man-centred picture of Islam. They were not of much help, however, in explaining the supernatural or invisible elements in Islam. Although they tended towards a spiritual interpretation of the supernatural, they did not go all the way,<sup>48</sup> as the philosophers did. Like the Ash'arites, they also failed to fully amalgamate reason and tradition in Islam, or to achieve a rationalised Islam suitable to Shibli's liking and purpose.

46. Ibid., pp. 22 f.

47. Ibid., pp. 25, 28-30.

Rationalist Theology

It, was, therefore, to the philosophers that Shibli turned next in his quest for reason, and thus for respectability and acceptability in Islam. He admits the incongruity of this move, but devotes a full section to the hukamā'-i Islām in his history of kalam. He is well aware that mutakallimīn and hukamā' are generally known to be in opposition to each other, but believes that the opposition is not real. "No doubt the general term hukamā' can be put in contraposition to the title mutakallimīn," he writes, "but when it is qualified by Islām, the veil of alienation is lifted; Imam Ghazālī and Ibn Rushd, who are called hukamā'-i Islām, are also in the vanguard of 'ilm i kalām.'<sup>49</sup> If another proof of their inter-relation, in fact a further justification for making use of philosophy in theology, is needed, Shibli provides it on the authority of Ibn Taymiyyah and Ibn Rushd. According to them, al-Fārābī and Ibn Sīnā adopted their characteristic Islamic theological doctrines, not from the Greeks whose theology was imperfect, but from the early theologians of Islam (qudāmā'-i mutakallimīn) themselves.<sup>50</sup> In varying details, Shibli abstracts the ideas of al-Fārābī, Ibn Sīnā, Ibn Miskawayh and Shaykh al-Ishrāq (he has already dealt with Ibn Rushd among the mutakallimīn and with al-Ghazālī in a separate monograph) on such issues as Soul, Prophecy, Angels, Revelation and Miracles.<sup>51</sup> The thing which appeals to Shibli most about these Muslim philosophers and which he stresses again and again is of course that their "main aim is conformity between falsafah and shari'ah."<sup>52</sup> That is what prompted him to own even the notorious Ikhwān al-Ṣafā',<sup>53</sup> and write sarcastically that Shaykh al-Ishrāq "mentions Zoroaster and others as Prophets, and counts the Greek philosophers among the ones close to God ; what more

48. Al-Kalām, p. 187.

Intellectual Modernism of Shibli Nu'mānī

49. 'Ilm al-Kalām, p. 120.

50. Ibid., pp. 153-56. It is not quite clear what exactly does Shibli mean by qudāmā'-i mutakallimīn. Probably it was just another way of referring to the early Mu'tazilites such as Abū al-Hudhayl, Hishām b. al-Ḥakam, Naṣṣām, and others. Also see Al-Kalām, p. 2.

51. 'Ilm al-Kalām, pp. 121-53.

52. Ibid., pp. 121 ; also see pp. 123 f., 125, 145, 146 f.

53. Ibid., pp. 145 f.

Rationalist Theology

evidence is required for [Shaykh al-Ishraq's] kufr!<sup>54</sup>

Now we come somewhat closer to knowing what Shibli really meant when he talked, in connection with the formulation of a new 'ilm-i kalām', of the old principles and the still useful part of the medieval kalām. He had in mind essentially the doctrines of the Mu'tazilites and the Muslim philosophers. That, however, is not the end of the matter. Shibli was aware that in referring back to the doctrines of the Mu'tazilites and Muslim philosophers he was face to face with two great difficulties, one practical and the other strategic. The practical difficulty was that not a single work of the Mu'tazilites, those "ancients" of 'ilm i kalām', was extant; all that he had available were quotations from their works and references to their doctrines in later, mostly Ash'arite, works on sects and theology, and specifically in the great exegetical work of al-Rāzī.<sup>55</sup> The strategic difficulty that Shibli faced was that if he was writing for the benefit of the contemporary Muslim readership, he could hardly expect to have the doctrines of Mu'tazilites and Muslim philosophers—both considered heretics by most Muslims—accepted on their own authority. In order to have receptive ears, in any number, for his words he had to find respectable mouthpieces of Ash'arite denomination, who had 54. Ibid., p. 149; also see pp. 145-53.

55. Al-Kalām, p. 2; 'Ilm al-Kalām, p. 162.

Intellectual Modernism of Shibli Nu'manī

either absorbed those doctrines in the recesses of their thoughts or at least had a kind word or two to say about them. Theologians like al-Ghazālī and al-Rāzī, who could talk through both sides of their mouths, were as if made to measure for this purpose.<sup>56</sup> This should not lead one to conclude that Shibli was merely using such persons. On the contrary, he truly believed in them, especially in al-Ghazālī whom he regarded as a thinker too independent to be really bound by the absurd, traditional Ash'arite system, and perhaps also too creative not to have contributed something on his own. In fact, before Rūmī finally caught his eye and won his heart, Shibli was almost hypnotised by al-Ghazālī, so much so that he once wrote: "If the edifice of the new 'ilm-i kalām can be erected today, it can be erected on the basis of his ideas."<sup>57</sup> But the fact remains that what attracted Shibli in al-Ghazālī and al-Rāzī was not the fact that they were Ash'arites—the usefulness of this fact apart, Shibli never compromised his position vis-a vis Ash'arism itself—but that they were inconsistent Ash'arites; that despite their professed, public Ash'arism, in some crucial respects they surreptitiously went in for Mu'tazilism and Islamic falsafah, in short, for

56. He was still accused of being infatuated with Mu'tazilism, and his disciple-biographer had to apologise for him by saying that it was actually the love of Māturīdism. Sayyid Sulaymān Nadwī, op. cit., p. 829.

57. 'Ilm al-Kalām, p. 146.

Rationalist Theology

reason. Al-Ghazālī, indeed, "completely merged manqūl with ma'qūl, and with such finesse that neither of them suffered in the process."<sup>58</sup> It is that accomplishment which makes him so great in the eyes of Shibli.

Shibli has taken many pains and pages in showing from the horse's own mouth the duality in al-Ghazālī's theological thought and works. Al-Ghazālī upheld Ash'arism and wrote one book after another in support of it, but he believed that "Ash'arism is good for the common people; otherwise, it neither contains the reality, nor can it give real satisfaction." Consequently, he produced another series of books (such as Jawāhir al-Qur'ān, Munqidh min al-Dalāl, Ma'dnūn Ṣaghīr wa Kabīr, Ma'ārij al-Quds, Mishkāt al-Anwār) in which, instead of following the Ash'arite pattern, he disclosed the hidden "realities". But he would not have those books generally published for fear of ununderstanding commoners and 'ulamā'.<sup>59</sup> Not heeding such counsels, however, Shibli considers it incumbent upon the authors of the new 'ilm-i kalām to throw these secret treasures open to the public. That is precisely what he would want to do himself.<sup>60</sup>

These "realities" are nothing but the doctrines of the Mu'tazilites and the Muslim philosophers.

58. Ibid.

59. Ibid., pp. 65 f., 146 f., 161 f.; Al-Kalām, pp. 2-6; Al-Ghazālī, pp. 189-201.

60. Al-Kalām, p. 6.

Intellectual Modernism of Shibli Nu'mānī

Al-Ghazālī, according to Shibli, rejected the characteristic Ash'arite doctrines such as that there is no causal chain and no inalienable property or nature, that things are not good and bad in themselves, that there is no reason, order or system in the creation of the world, in favour of the corresponding Mu'tazilite doctrines.<sup>61</sup> Even in the case of legitimately Islamic doctrines—particularly Prophecy, miracles, soul, life after death, reward and punishment—he gave up the Ash'arite method and brought forward new arguments, some of which were in use among the hukamā'. Indeed, on the questions of soul, supernatural events and punishment in the Hereafter he followed Ibn Sīnā; and on the questions of revelation, and visions and hearings of the Prophets he copied Ibn Miskawayh.<sup>62</sup> The next major contribution of al-Ghazālī to kalām—besides the introduction and employment of falsafah, and adoption of Mu'tazilism in some of the crucial issues (though the latter fact faded into oblivion under his blatant, public Ash'arism)—was, according to Shibli, the distinction between the essential and inessential beliefs in Islam and, in addition, regulation of the principles of ta'wīl of nusūṣ sharīyyah which, on the one hand, discouraged the practice of takfir and brought greater harmony among the sects 61. Al-Ghazālī, pp. 209-13, 296 f., 362 f.

62. Ibid., pp. 224-64 (particularly 224, 242, 252, 256); also pp. 297-300, 356-62; 'Ilm al-Kalām, pp. 144 f.

Rationalist Theology

and, on the other hand, opened the way to further rationalisation.<sup>63</sup> Shibli is very appreciative of these contributions and makes use of them in his new kalām.

Al-Rāzī, apparently the most aggressive Ash'arite of all times,<sup>64</sup> also held, according to Shibli, actually quite different views which he expressed mostly in his Tafsīr through the tongue of those whom he collectively calls at different places hukamā'-i Islām or arbāb-i ma'qūlāt.<sup>65</sup> Shibli is particularly appreciative of al-Rāzī's Tafsīr in so far as it is written on "rationalistic" lines, and says that al-Rāzī

"has been much more free and unprejudiced in the Tafsīr than in his works on kalām; frequently . . . quotes the opinions of hukamā'-i Islām and, though they are against the Ash'arites, praises them and approves them; moreover, he makes use of the tafsīrs of his antagonists, the Mu'tazilites, often mentioning their doctrines without any criticism; in fact sometimes praising them involuntarily."

Shibli appreciatively mentions several such "real views of the imām which are the core of the science of kalām" from the Tafsīr. What makes them the core of the science of kalām is of course that they are "in accordance with falsafah and 'aql'". Likewise, Shibli quotes from the Tafsīr instances of al-Rāzī's preference for the interpretations made

63. Al-Ghazālī, pp. 213-23, 285-93; 'Ilm al-Kalām, pp. 190-96; al-Kalām, pp. 173-97.

64. 'Ilm al-Kalām, p. 72.

65. Ibid., pp. 73-76, 120 f.

Intellectual Modernism of Shibli Nu'mani

by the Mu'tazilite exegist Abū Muslim Isfahānī.<sup>66</sup> Shibli is also very pleased with al-Rāzī for having refuted the "anti-rational" Jewish traditions of tafsīr literature, something which the Mu'tazilites also did but could not get away with simply because they were Mu'tazilites.<sup>67</sup> Shibli, however, is aware of the fact that the manqūl still out-balances the ma'qūl in al-Rāzī and that he wrote books in refutation of Mu'tazilism. He, therefore, quotes, as a further proof of his real, rationalist views which he could not present openly for fear of persecution, adverse comments on al-Rāzī's beliefs by traditionists like al-Dhahabī and Ibn Hajar to the effect that he "created doubts about the fundamentals of religion" and that he "presented the objections of the opponents more forcefully than the reply on behalf of the Ahl al-Sunnah."<sup>68</sup> Shibli singles out al-Rāzī's alternate argument on Prophecy in his last work, Maṭālib-i 'Āliyah, to be appended (along with al-Ghazālī's argument on the same subject from Ma'ārij al-Quds) to his Al-Kalām, perhaps because the later writers had deliberately ignored it on account of its being out of step with the Ash'arite doctrines.<sup>69</sup>

Al-Ghazālī and al-Rāzī were by no means the only pillars of Shibli's new kalām, or the only bridges to the good old principles and to the use-

66. Ibid., pp. 74-76, 77, 178-83.

67. Ibid., pp. 78 f.

69. Ibid., p. 204; Al-Kalām, pp. 224-59.

68. Ibid., pp. 79-81.

Rationalist Theology

ful in medieval kalām, even if they were the ones who, for reasons made obvious, were played up the most. The only other person to compete with them in this respect was the relatively late Shāh Wali Allāh, partly for the same reasons but partly also, as in the case of al-Ghazālī, because of his own contribution to kalām. There were other, earlier mutakallimīn, not so prominent and seldom referred to in the presentation of the actual content of the new kalām, but very useful in demolishing the edifice of Ash'arism and building up a case for a greater and greater role of reason in Islamic theology, Shibli's one and only obsession. No other consideration weighed more with him in the selection of a thinker or selection from his ideas than his rationalism. That was one qualification which they all, persons as diverse an Ibn Taymiyyah and Ibn Rushd, had in common, at least in the eyes of Shibli. Besides harmonising reason and tradition and severely criticising the Ash'arite kalām for being neither rational nor traditional, Ibn Rushd made an original contribution to the science of kalām in that he claimed and demonstrated that Qur'anic argumentation on theological matters is not merely rhetorical and persuasive but logical and demonstrative. Shibli was attracted by this argument and made use of it in his new kalām.<sup>70</sup> Ibn Taymiyyah has to his credit perhaps the boldest criticism so far

70. 'Ilm al-Kalām, pp. 96-99.

Intellectual Modernism of Shibli Nu'manī

of the Ash'arite doctrines such as that everything that exists can be perceived by the senses, all bodies are alike and are composed of atoms, God did not create anything with a reason, nor did He characterise bodies with faculties and natures, and there are not underlying reasons in His law. Despite being “bigoted, crusty and intensely imimical to philosophy,” he preferred the doctrines of the natural and mathematical sciences over those of the mutakallimīn, and also held that the reality of the events after death is different from what is given to understand.<sup>71</sup>

During his intellectual journey from al-Ghazālī to Rūmī the only person who really excited Shibli and left a lasting impression on his mind was Shāh Wali Allāh, or rather his Hujjat Allāh al-Bālighah which Shibli regards as a work of kalām since it treats the shari'ah—and not merely ‘aqā'id in the usual, narrow sense—as if it were the subject-matter of kalām, and shows the revealed nature of the shari'ah through its miraculous perfection. Shāh Wali Allāh was of course going to show that “all the matters of the shari'ah are in accordance with reason”; and he was also “generally against the characteristic doctrines of the Ash'arites”. But Shibli is particularly enthusiastic about two things. One is Shāh Wali Allāh's concept of non-elemental or non-material worlds ('ālam-i mithāl, 'ālam-i barzakh) which, if only the 'ulama' would also accept it. Shibli regards as the peacemaker between philosophy and religion since it accommodates all the supernatural elements in Islam in the way philosophers would have it. The other thing which thrills Shibli in Shāh Walī Allāh is the novel way he goes about underlining the miraculousness of the Qur'ān through the contents of its teaching on ethics, purification of the soul, Unity of God, Prophecy and the Hereafter. Shibli was also impressed with Shāh Walī Allāh's explanation of the repetition and disorderliness in the Qur'ān, something which had upset Carlyle.<sup>72</sup>

71. Ibid., pp. 102, 106 f., 184.

Rationalist Theology

With these men and their ideas at his command Shibli turned to writing his theology for today. We have already noticed how Shibli was acting under modern influences in the choice of his men and their ideas, not to mention the fact that the very rationale of his theological enterprise was provided by the modern rationalist impulse. He did not become a modernist because he was impressed by the spirit and thinking of the Mu'tazilites and the Muslim philosophers. He went and got himself impressed by their spirit and thinking because he was a modernist with an intense sense of his Islamic past, because he wanted to be a modernist within his own historico-religious tradition, in short, because he wanted to internalise an external impulse. At the same time he was prudent enough, perhaps learning from Sayyid Ahmad Khān's fiasco, not to go courting medieval Islamic rationalists too openly. We shall now have the opportunity to see this under-cover, medievalised modernism at work in the actual layout of Shibli's new kalām.

72. Ibid., pp. 111-19; Al-Kalām, pp. 201-09.

Intellectual Modernism of Shibli Nu'manī

We also noted above that Shibli, who had set out with the purpose of offering a solution different from that of Sayyid Ahmad Khān, was apparently able to depart from the latter rather crucially. Failing to fully maintain that science and religion operated at two different levels or in two different spheres, Shibli challenged, even if at the cost of confusion in terms, Sayyid Ahmad Khān's interpretation of nature as a closed system of immutable laws which allowed of no supernatural intervention. We shall be seeing again this departure from Sayyid Ahmad Khān's stand, for whatever worth it is, in Shibli's actual restatement of Islamic faith for modern times. But often enough Shibli will be found agreeing rather than disagreeing with Sayyid Ahmad Khān's solution concerning the specific religious beliefs of Islam, perhaps because he was drawing upon more or less the same sources as Sayyid Ahmad Khān did.

(5)

The problem of the existence of God was obviously not stirring enough for Shibli—perhaps because he felt that the belief in His existence is not really consequent upon rational arguments—for he dealt with it in a rather hurried and cursory manner, without his usual verve and relish. He starts by rejecting the old arguments from the contingency and movement of the world, because they depend on positing the absurdity of infinite regress to which Shibli does not subscribe. The former is all the more unacceptable to him because it further depends on the assumption, unsupported by experience, that matter itself is contingent. These arguments have the added weakness, according to Shibli, that they affirm only a cause of the causes and not necessarily an efficient and powerful God<sup>73</sup> (noticeable here is the difference from Sayyid Ahmad Khan for whom God is the "First Cause," in the emanationist spirit of the Muslim philosophers).<sup>74</sup> For his part Shibli, besides asserting that belief in God is part of human nature (Max Müller and others are cited), prefers the Qur'anic argument from harmony in the universe (again citing the European hukamā', such as Newton and Spencer) as an aid to the innate belief.<sup>75</sup>

Rationalist Theology

Shibli is well aware of the atheists' (malāhidah's) arguments against the existence of God and describes them in detail.<sup>76</sup> But it seems that, like his medieval predecessors, he presented the arguments of his opponents too forcefully to be

73. Ibid., pp. 30-34.

74. Fazlur Rahman, Islam, p. 218.

75. Al-Kalām, pp. 35-39.

76. Ibid., pp. 40-54.

Intellectual Modernism of Shibli Nu'mani

able really to counter them.<sup>77</sup> For instance, he had to admit that in the absence of positive evidence on the existence or non-existence of a thing we tend, in daily experience, to deny its existence. Shibli, however, would not admit its implications for the existence of God, without explaining himself.<sup>78</sup> Likewise, he responds to their arguments by readily, indeed eagerly, admitting with them that the world, composed of atoms, is eternal (a doctrine held, according to Shibli, by the Mu'tazilites<sup>79</sup> and by Muslim philosophers such as al-Fārābī, Ibn Sīnā and Ibn Rushd; indeed, he says, as Ibn Rushd has pointed out, the doctrine is indicated by the Qur'ān itself); that the motion of atoms is essential to matter; that there are various laws of nature in accordance with which these atoms meet and coalesce so that faculties and properties are born into them. Shibli stops short, however, of following the immediate inference that the world can be imagined without a Creator, and insists that it does not solve the problem. There must be a superior power which controls and harmonises the innumerable laws of nature, since harmony is not an essential property of these laws. (Milane Edward and others are cited.)<sup>80</sup>

77. Cf. Sayyid Sulaymān Nadwī, op. cit., pp. 831 f.

78. Al-Kalām, pp. 41 f.

79. He is mistaken in attributing this doctrine to the Mu'tazilites.

80. Al-Kalām, pp. 54-57.

Rationalist Theology

Obviously, Shibli is struggling to reconcile the idea of an eternal world with the idea of an eternal God. He must have felt that once one of these propositions is affirmed the other is rendered superfluous. But he could not let go of the idea of God for obvious reasons, and would not let go of the idea of an eternal world because to him it was an established scientific truth proven by the indestructibility of matter. Had he thought that the eternity of the world was merely a medieval dogma of theologians or philosophers, he would have gladly thrown it out of the window.<sup>81</sup>

To prove the Unity of God Shibli employs the argument of the absurdity of two complete causes of a single effect, which again he bases on the Qur'an. He also emphasises the fact that the idea of the Unity of God is universal to all religions, Islam's uniqueness consisting in the perfection of the idea. Perfect Unity of God is also needed, according to him, for the spiritual and moral well-being of humans.<sup>82</sup>

Shibli rejects the argument based on biological evolution and the fact of evil in the world against the existence of a God attributed with power, wisdom, will, justice and mercy. He maintains that evolution, properly understood, is an argument in favour of His power. He argues also that

81. Eventually he had to throw it out of the window when he found himself faced with the fatwā of heresy : Sayyid Sulaymān Nadwī, op. cit., p. 823.

82. Al-Kalām, pp. 59-62.

it was not possible to create good without also necessarily creating evil; the apparent flourishing of evil, moreover, should not be judged on the basis of such a short span of life in this world.<sup>83</sup>

(6)

When it comes to the question of Prophecy, Shibli appears to be at home. He is in obvious disagreement with the usual Ash'arite notion that Prophecy is an office which God bestows arbitrarily upon whomsoever He wishes and that miracle is a necessary condition for Prophecy distinguishing a true nabi from a false one.<sup>84</sup>

He takes up the latter part of the question first. To begin with, he does not believe that miracles can or ever have occurred in a way so as to break the natural law of causation. However, because of their unusual quality or their deviation from a generally prevalent pattern ('ām 'ādat-i jāriyah) miracles may look as though they contravene nature. In reality there are always natural reasons for miraculous happenings, even if they are extraordinary. He cites Ibn Sīnā and Shāh Walī Allāh in his support; and takes al-Rāzī to book for trying to prove the possibility of interruption in natural behaviour by "some unusual spherical movement," saying that he did not realise that in such a case it was no longer an interruption in natural behaviour. Thus as long as an event does not violate the natural law of cause and effect, but only deviates from the 'ādah', that is to say, contradicts what is generally believed to be natural at a given point in time and space, Shibli does not deny the possibility and occurrence of miracles.<sup>85</sup> And this marks Shibli's major departure from Sayyid Ahmad Khān who on principle rejects the possibility of miracles, perhaps because, being more thoroughly consistent, he does not make the illegitimate distinction between 'ādah' and natural law.

83. Ibid., pp. 57-59.

84. Ibid., p. 62.

Rationalist Theology

Indeed, in a section devoted especially to this question Shibli takes the "modern group" (firqah-i jadidah; the reference is obviously to Sayyid Ahmad Khān) to task for going to the other extreme, in contraposition to the "credulous Muslims," by denying the occurrence of an event if it is in appearance contrary to nature, and by indulging in ta'wil of the Qur'ān on such occasions. But, Shibli says:

"kharq-i 'ādah is a necessary element of all religions, and it cannot be denied that in Islam too there is some trace of it . . . no doubt, the Ash'arite excess in this matter has gone to the extent of childish superstition, but total denial [of miracles] is also nothing short of obstinacy."

Raising the questions: Have all the laws of nature been determined? Can we be rest assured that the things which we are taking to be the laws of nature

85. Ibid., pp. 77-84.

Intellectual Modernism of Shibli Nu'mānī

are really so?—Shibli answers that “the investigations and experiments of modern sciences have discovered hundreds of laws of nature which were totally unknown before, and this process continues.” Things which were regarded as impossible, Shibli says, are being proven to be possible.<sup>86</sup> In this connection he points out the results of experiments in mesmerism and spiritusalism.<sup>87</sup> Thus, he says:

“No intelligent person can deny the khawāriq-i ‘ādāt, but the difference is that superstitious and credulous people believe that they happen directly by the qudrat of God, and the elite (like al-Ghazālī, Ibn Rushd, Shah Wali Allāh and Ibn Sīnā) believe that since everything in this world is bound up with causes, therefore, there is one reason or another for these khārq-i ‘ādāt.<sup>88</sup>

Indeed, Shibli suggests on the authority of Ibn Sīnā and al-Ghazālī that the miracles of the Prophets occur due to their developed psychic powers.<sup>89</sup>

But Shibli was reluctant about accepting that a specific miracle had actually occurred. Even in the case of the Qur’ān, unless the text is conclusive (qat’ī al-dalālah), he would not (like Qaffāl, Abū Muslim Iṣfahānī and Abū Bakr Aṣamm) take it as referring to a miracle, not to speak of “all kinds of absurd and really impossible things” affirmed by the Ash’arites and the generality of Muslims.<sup>90</sup>

86. Ibid., pp. 115 f.

87. Ibid., pp. 117-26.

88. Ibid., p. 126.

89. Ibid., pp. 128 f.

90. Ibid., pp. 129 f.

Rationalist Theology

He was especially angry with the Ash'arites for stretching the bounds of possibility to include all kinds of improbabilities, while not realising the more immediate likelihood that the narrator of the event may have been mistaken.<sup>91</sup> It is remarkable that, despite his basic divergence from Sayyid Aḥmad Khān's approach and aim in the matter, Shibli shows close affinity with him in practically discouraging belief in superstitions and miracles and encouraging belief in an essentially scientific weltanschauung.

To come back to the question of Prophecy, although Shibli admits, with qualification, the possibility and occurrence of miracles, he still would not regard them as a proof of Prophecy. On this matter one should take Shibli's zestful exposition of al-Rāzī's hypothetical objection to the Ash'arite position as well as Ibn Rushd's objection to the same, as representing his own views. Both of these objections may be reduced to the same basic argument: there is no way to know the kharq-i 'ādah of a true Prophet even if the event really were an effect without a cause or a cause without an effect, from that of a pretender who may be a jinn, a devil or a magician capable, according to the Ash'arites, of kharq-i 'ādah. Shibli would also hold that one cannot tell an instance of prophetic kharq-i 'ādah from a trick or a psychic effect of a non-prophet.<sup>92</sup>

91. Ibid., p. 83.

92. Ibid., pp. 67-73.

Intellectual Modernism of Shibli Nu'mani

Not only can miracle not be offered as a proof of Prophecy, but in Shibli's view (based mainly on Qur'anic verses but also on statements by al-Razi, Shāh Wali Allāh and Ibn Rushd) it has no essential relationship with Prophecy.<sup>93</sup> The fact that he can turn a stick into a snake, Shibli says, following al-Razi's hypothetical objector, has nothing to do with the Prophet's ability to lead people to happiness in the two worlds, any more than the ability to endure hunger for twenty consecutive days will make one an expert in geometry.<sup>94</sup> Shibli is fond of quoting a statement of al-Ghazālī saying: ". . . hence, seek belief in Prophecy through this method and not through the turning of a stick into a snake or the splitting of the moon."<sup>95</sup> It is this "other method" which is the object of Shibli's positive concern in the question of Prophecy—a method preferred by the muhaqqiqin.

This method is to know the reality of Prophecy and its function in human life and, then, to see whether the Prophet's teachings and his role are consistent with this reality and function. Shibli quotes al-Razi, Shāh Wali Allāh, al-Ghazālī and Ibn Hazm at length to elaborate his point. The idea is that just as man has many other faculties or powers (quwwaten) he has been endowed with a spiritual power (quwwat i qudsiyah yā malikah-i nubuwah) to perceive the ultimate realities and moral concepts, for the compelling purposes of social organisation. This power, however, like the others, is distributed unequally among men, so much so that some are almost devoid of it. It is, therefore, a rational-natural necessity, at least it is not unlikely, that there be persons who have this power to the limit of perfection. Thus, they may also take care of others, less endowed, by standardising the law of morality and purifying the souls. These persons are Prophets; and this power at its perfection is not something acquired through intellectual processes. It is beyond the realm of intellect and learning. It is inborn. Prophets can be likened to the geniuses in other fields of human activity. Prophets are in a sense spiritual and moral geniuses. It is this genius or perceptive power which is called ilhām or wahy, and which operates as natural instinct in lower forms of life.<sup>96</sup> (On comparison it will be found that Shibli's views are akin to those of Sayyid Ahmad Khān on the subject of the reality of revelation and Prophecy.)<sup>97</sup> One may incidentally, but significantly, observe here that, although Shibli is not, unlike Sayyid Ahmad Khān, in pursuit of a natural religion, he shows a tendency towards a human religion. Following his medieval masters, but perhaps inspired by modern humanism, he appears to be turning the God-man relationship into a man-God relationship. It seems that in his understanding it is man who reaches out to God rather than God to man. It is man who is the centre of religious activity rather than God.

93. Ibid., pp. 84-88.

94. Ibid., pp. 71 f.

95. Ibid., pp. 88, 89, 104.

96. Ibid., pp. 89-102.

97. Aziz Ahmad, op. cit., pp. 43 f.

Once it is recognised what Prophecy is, one cannot but know a Prophet, just as knowledge of fiqh brings recognition that al-Shāfi'i was a faqīh. It is not only the teachings, especially the Qur'ān, but also the character of the Prophet which tell us that he is a true Prophet.<sup>98</sup> Such was Shibli's method to prove the truthfulness of the Prophet. He wrote many pages to show the excellence of Islamic teachings and prefaced the exposition with a general discussion of the principles of the Prophets' method of teachings mainly derived from Shāh Wali Allāh. In that preface he tried to make two or three points. Since the guidance of the common people is the paramount object of a Prophet's teachings, their level of understanding has been taken into consideration in the shari'ah (the Qur'ān included). One should not, however, judge the shari'ah on that basis alone, since it also contains pointers to the reality of things for the elite. It should not be judged on the basis of its extra-individual-spiritual and social-moral content either, since there the contemporary level of scientific and historical knowledge has been taken into account. Finally, even in the proper concerns of the shari'ah one should not forget that the shari'ahs prior to the Prophet's in general, and the Prophet's

98. Al-Kalām, pp. 103-05.

Rationalist Theology

shari'ah in particular, incorporated many local customs and practices which are now open to change.<sup>99</sup> With these preliminary remarks, Shibli goes on to underline, in some detail, the excellence of the Prophet's teachings on theology, ethics, social code and the principles of civilisation as a proof of his Prophecy.<sup>100</sup>

After emphasising that Islam discouraged taqlid in matters of belief (which later led to the Lutheran Reformation),<sup>101</sup> he points out the highly non-material concept of God in Islam (which astonished even Gibbon),<sup>102</sup> the direct relationship between man and God<sup>103</sup> and humanliness of the Prophet.<sup>104</sup> Allowing that the usual concept of reward and punishment in the Hereafter was good for the common people and that Islam employed it for that reason, Shibli maintains that Islam is unique in indicating, at the same time, its reality (which bears close resemblance with Sayyid Ahmad's view of it). As al-Ghazālī put it, reward and punishment are the inalienable effects of good and bad deeds on the soul. "Hell is right inside you," al-Ghazālī writes in his commentary on a Qur'ānic verse. Fondly quoting this and other commentaries by al-Ghazālī to the same effect, Shibli tops them with this concluding remark from him: "If you

99. Ibid., pp. 105-15; also see below, pp. 70-73.

100. Al-Kalām, pp. 130-33.

101. Ibid., pp. 133-35.

102. Ibid., pp. 135-37.

103. Ibid., p. 137.

104. Ibid., pp. 137-39.

Intellectual Modernism of Shibli Nu'māni

did not understand the meanings in this manner, then you did not get from the Qur'ān anything except the crust, as the cattle get only the husk from the wheat.”<sup>105</sup> Next, Shibli deals with rituals, human rights, the position of the women, the law of inheritance and the status of non-Muslims in a manner which has now become standard in the modern apologetics of Islam.<sup>106</sup>

(7)

Although Shibli would rather have Islamic theology based only on the Unity of God and Prophethood of Muhammad (peace of Allah be upon him), and tried even to belittle the rest of the dogmatic paraphernalia, he could not very well ignore these other doctrines, at least not those bearing upon the spiritual or invisible world, in other words, angelology and eschatology. These doctrines were the supernatural element of Islam par excellence and thus the most sensitive and vulnerable part of Islamic theology and for that matter perhaps of any theology. Shibli was perfectly aware of their importance and he, therefore, dealt with them at some length. It is here indeed that one finds Shibli fully and finally exposed. The mere fact that he gives the invisible world the alternative name of ruhāniyāt should be a sufficient indication of the drift of his mind.<sup>107</sup> But he 105. Ibid., pp. 139-43; Aziz Ahmad, op. cit., p. 46.

106. Al-Kalām, pp. 143-67.

107. Ibid., pp. 167-71.

Rationalist Theology

makes his intent abundantly clear in the course of the actual discussion which he prefaces by a long discourse on ta'wil derived from al-Ghazālī.

Mentioning the three historic positions—i.e. literal, metaphoric and spiritual interpretations—taken on the question of the reality of invisible matters or mutashābihāt in Islam, Shibli regards the defining of the scope of ta'wil (which increases gradually with the literalists, the common Ash'arites, Māturīdites, Mu'tazilites and hukamā') as pertinent to this question, and to this end he quotes al-Ghazālī extensively. We need not go into the matter except to point out that Shibli, though very appreciative of al-Ghazālī's elaborations of the principles of ta'wil as well of his actual ta'wil in a number of matters, differs from him on a fundamental point. Al-Ghazālī is against employing ta'wil in matters eschatological on the basis of the principle that they are not rationally impossible. Shibli would not permit this stand to go unchallenged. First, he points out that al-Ghazālī expresses this view only in the works which are meant for general consumption, whereas in other works he has disclosed the secret. Secondly, he shows al-Ghazālī's inconsistency in those very works where he employs ta'wil in certain matters which are not rationally impossible. Finally, he criticises the concept of muhāl itself from two angles. At best it is a relative term, the referent of which may differ from person to person. Indeed, al-Ghazali himself takes this factor into consideration and refrains from charging the Hanbalites with kufr for their belief that God is dhū jihah and dhū ishārah, because it is not rationally impossible, according to them.

“Surely this is very generous of the Imām Ṣāhib [Shibli says], but why should this generosity be limited to the Hanbalites? According to the philosophers of Islam, i‘ādah-i ma‘dūm is rationally impossible and, therefore, they do not believe in bodily resurrection. Why then does the Imām Ṣāhib charge them with kufr? ”

At worst the concept is inadequate, for it does not include the practically impossible and the improbable. Thus, except for a thing or two, everything is possible according to this concept. Such a thinking, Shibli declares, is at the root of all kinds of superstitions among the Muslims today. Shibli ends the discourse with this significant conclusion: “If a thing is mentioned in the shari‘ah, it is not necessary that it has an external existence.”<sup>108</sup> In the following section he explains what kind of existence such non-material, non-sensible things may have.

A great many of “the apparently irrational things in the shari‘ah” Shibli would explain as metaphorical expressions (such as the covenant of mankind with God in eternity, God’s sitting on the throne, etc.) or as material expressions of spiritual things (such as reward and punishment

108. Ibid., pp. 171-97.

Rationalist Theology

after death, etc.). But this still leaves out a great number of "those spiritual things or meanings (rūhāniyāt or ma'āni) which appear to the Prophets in material form". To explain these Shibli makes use of what al-Ghazālī calls wujūd-i hissī or tamaththul-i khayālī (sensory existence or imaginative picturisation), what Shaykh al-Ishrāq calls 'ālam-i ashbāh' or 'ālam-i amthāl' (world of spirits or similitudes) and what Shāh Wali Allah calls 'ālam-i mithāl' (world of images) and ālam-i barzakh (world of suspension?). Although these thinkers include in this category many eschatological matters, as well as jinns and devils (Shaykh al-Ishrāq), mi'rāj, etc. (Shāh Wali Allah), Shibli would include these things, if we have not misunderstood him, in the second category (i.e. material expressions of spiritual things) and would reserve the last category to explain the visions and auditions of the Prophets, that is, the reality of the angels and the revelation. It is not quite clear whether Shibli is referring to the concepts of all three thinkers or only to that of al-Ghazālī when he explains the nature of the existence of the angels and of the phenomenon of revelation in these words: These things occur in a dream-like condition obtaining, due to deep concentration of the subject, in the state of being fully awake, in which the psyche or the imaginative power (rūh yā nafs yā quwwat-i mutakhayyilah) acts untrammelled by the ordinary senses. "No objection is brought against this ihtimāl,” Shibli says, “from the viewpoint of present-day sciences and philosophy.” He concludes the section with this revealing remark: “Al Farābī, Ibn Sīnā and others are of the same opinion, but we did not mention their elaborations because these people are not regarded as authoritative from a religious point of view.”<sup>109</sup>

(8)

Although it was meant to be so, Shibli’s Al-Kalām was not destined to be the final statement of his views on the problems of a new, updated theology of Islam. It is perhaps not surprising that Shibli’s quest for a more satisfying kalām for his age should have eventually led him to Rūmī with whose ideas he had already become acquainted in the course of his earlier works on kalām. He had indeed argued from Rūmī’s views on a few occasions.<sup>110</sup> He must have realised then the great potential of Rūmī or rather of his Mathnawī for the new kalām. But this was not perhaps the only reason why Shibli ended up with Rūmī. He knew that a stage came in the history of the evolution of Islamic dogma when falsafah and taṣawwuf had merged into each other.<sup>111</sup> Consciously or unconsciously, he was probably himself heading in that direction. The mystical rationalism of Rūmī was thus only a logical next step from

109. Ibid., pp. 197-218.

110. Ibid., pp. 104, 209-12.

111. ‘Ilm al-Kalām, p. 16.

Rationalist Theology

the philosophical rationalism of the Mu'tazilites and of the Muslim philosophers.

Although Shibli did not—despite his initially stated view that science and religion are worlds apart from each other—miss the opportunity to point out in Rūmī's thought the germs of Darwinian evolutionism and certain other theories of modern science,<sup>112</sup> this was not what really attracted him to Rūmī. The magnetism of Rūmī lay in the fact that he, unlike the Ash'arites, succeeded in creating a feeling of credibility or plausibility (idh'ān yā zann-i ghālib) in the heart, which is “the limit of factuality in philosophical matters”.<sup>113</sup> This Rūmī achieved by using qiyās-i tamthīlī instead of the usual qiyās-i shumūlī.<sup>114</sup> Shibli admits that it was not possible for Rūmī to be completely immune from the worldwide storm of Ash'arism and consequently he often based his doctrines on Ash'arite principles. “But,” says Shibli, “when he explains them, the upper layers continue to peel off and in the end only the core of the matter remains.”<sup>115</sup>

Before going into those specific points of interest which Shibli found in Rūmī's Mathnawī, one or two things should be clarified. Aziz Ahmad has claimed that “Rūmī's kalām, as he [Shibli] sums it up, . . . is based on an eclecticism which refuses to regard any religion as abso-

112. Sawāniḥ, pp. 219-24.

113. Ibid., p. 97; see also pp. 7, 121 f.

114. Ibid., pp. 98 ff.

115. Ibid., pp. 94 f.

Intellectual Modernism of Shibli Nu'mani

lately false, but considers that religions are mixed in various proportions with elements of falsehood and truth.”<sup>116</sup>

This may be a true assessment of Rumi's kalām, but probably not of Shibli's understanding of it, or at least of what he was trying to derive from it. Aziz Ahmad's statement seems all the more strange in view of the fact that the very first heading in the section of Shibli's Sawāniḥ Mawlānā Rūm devoted to a topical study of Rumi's kalām reads: “madhāhib-i mukhtalifah men se ek na ek madhhab ka sahīh honā darūr hay”. Below Shibli argues from Rumi against relativism in the matter of true and false religions.<sup>117</sup> His liberalism notwithstanding, we know that Shibli never went to the extent of compromising the exclusiveness of Islam.

It is also not quite true to say that “it is to Rumi that Shibli turns in quest of an angelology and an eschatology more reconcilable with orthodoxy than those of Sayyid Ahmad Khan.”<sup>118</sup> Though Shibli was not the one to shun additional support, particularly if it came from such a venerated person and Ash'arite as Rumi, he had already dealt with these and various other questions of belief in his earlier works on kalām.<sup>119</sup> What he discovered in Rumi, if one were to believe Shibli, was a better, more convincing way of argumenta-

116. Aziz Ahmad, op. cit., p. 85.

117. Sawāniḥ, pp. 123 f.

118. Aziz Ahmad, op. cit., p. 85.

119. See 'Ilm al-Kalām, Al-Ghazālī and Al-Kalām, passim.

Rationalist Theology

tion, a clearer, more appealing presentation of faith. For instance, on the question of resurrection (which, by the way, is the only part of eschatology dealt with in the context of Rūmī) Shibli liked Rūmī's positive argument—which he presented over and above the usual negative argument from the imperishability of the soul. He liked the way Rūmī argued for the plausibility of resurrection from the process of evolution in life, a Darwinian as well as Qur'anic concept, according to Shibli. There is likely to be still another, better stage of life. This, Shibli says, is in consonance with modern science which holds that matter and energy are indestructible. Body and soul will, thus, only assume another form.<sup>120</sup> Another instance of Shibli's preference for Rūmīan interpretation is seen in the question of the reality of angels. Though Shibli had already assigned them a dream-like existence, he goes further and clearly states with reference to Rūmī that they are nothing but powers emanating from man himself.<sup>121</sup> This can hardly be regarded as "more reconcilable with orthodoxy".

Perhaps the most important, substantive contribution that Rūmī made to Shibli's theological thought was Rūmī's explanation of the cosmic order in which the concepts of soul and evolution played an important part. Rūmī viewed the cosmic order as denoting a progressive dematerialisation of things, called tajarrud 'an al-māddah. Beginning from the low, elemental stage of inanimate beings (jamād) and going through the first compound stage in plants (nabāt), things become less and less material as they go up and up; until they reach the animal (hayawān) stage where they acquire soul or perception. The evolution continues in the soul—the human soul and the prophetic soul being only stages in this process—till one arrives at the pure, sublime God.<sup>122</sup> Shibli presents this scheme not so much as an argument for the existence of the Soul, Prophecy and God, as an effective means—if only one ponders the cosmic order—to combat the pervasiveness of materialism which is undermining the roots of religion. It has, however, been used by Rūmī, not without eliciting Shibli's admiration, to prove the existence of God. The argument rests on learning through induction that less material things, which are also comparatively hidden, real and superior, are the cause of more material things in this world. The decreasing materiality of the causes continues in the upper reaches of the cosmic scale till one attains of necessity the absolutely non-material, non-sensible and most sublime existent, namely, God. Shibli prefers this argument to those of the mutakallimīn, since it affirms not merely a cause of the causes but a God with sublime attributes.<sup>123</sup> Not less importantly, in Rūmī's concept of wahdat

<sup>120</sup> Sawāniḥ, pp. 174-79.

<sup>121</sup> Ibid., pp. 145-47.

Intellectual Modernism of Shibli Nu'māni

122. Ibid., pp. 162-72.

123. Ibid., pp. 126-30.

Rationalist Theology

al-wujūd, Shibli finally seems to find a satisfactory solution to the problem of how a world which is eternal can be still regarded as created by God. It can be so regarded because it is not an effect but a manifestation of an eternal God. "Thus, as far as falsafah is concerned," Shibli says, "there is no alternative except for the doctrine of the Sūfis." But even the shari'ah and nusūs-i Qur'ānī are not against it.<sup>124</sup>

Generally noticeable in Shibli's treatment of, and reliance upon, Rūmī is perhaps a more sober and mature stand on the specific problems of theology. The new trend is particularly evidenced by his treatment of the problem of predestination and free-will. Though he never regarded the controversy over this question a legitimate concern of kalām, old or new, he was an earnest believer in the free-will of man, and harshly critical of the Ash'arites for their stand to the contrary. So is he even now. Underlining the necessity for holding man responsible for his actions, he goes on to cite from Rūmī one argument after another in support of his view. But now he at least realises the difficulties involved, on a psychological level, in exclusive assertion of or, for that matter, denial of free-will. Though predestination in an absolute sense is still out, since it goes against spontaneous intuition (badahah), there is at least a case for it as a fact of human psychology.<sup>125</sup>

124. Ibid., pp. 204-06.

125. Ibid., pp. 185-94.

Intellectual Modernism of Shibli Nu'mani

Finally, there is also noticeable on a still more general level a subtle but unmistakable shift of emphasis in Shibli's overall attitude towards the problem of reason and faith, or science and religion. Shibli had never asked for scientific certainty in the matter of religious beliefs. He, in fact, started with an attempt to differentiate between the quality of scientific and religious truths. By the time he reached Rumi he seems to have become more convinced of the fact that one can never establish religious truths in any scientific sense; one can only create necessary conditions for beliefs. What really matters is that man should be persuaded to believe by showing the plausibility of religious truths, by appealing to his common sense and feeling. In short, religious truths are not empirical but emotive. Perhaps most important in connection with this is Shibli's realisation that, in the final analysis, the hold of naturalism and materialism over the minds of men must be weakened—perhaps through mystical-philosophical contemplation—if religion as a transcendental concept is to stay, and if the idea of a living and personal God is to play any role in the life of man.<sup>126</sup>

126. Ibid., pp. 130 f.

II

---

Changing Law

(1)

If one were to characterise Shibli's thinking on Islamic law rather superficially, one could sum it up just by saying that Shibli was a Hanafite.<sup>1</sup> He started as a conscious Hanafite and died as such. His earliest known writings, Zill al Ghāmām fi Mas'ālat al-Qir'at Khalf al-Imām (in Urdu) and Iskāt al-Mu'tadī 'alā Insāt al-Muqtadī (in Arabic), were written in support of Hanafism and in refutation of Ahl-i Hadīth or ghayr muqallidin.<sup>2</sup> A few months before his death he declared in a statement about his beliefs that "I am a Hanafite both in beliefs and in juristic matters".<sup>3</sup> But a closer look reveals that except for the name almost nothing was common between his earlier and later Hanafism. He may have remained a ghālī Hanafite to the last,<sup>4</sup> but the meaning and content of his

1. The nisbah Nu'mānī is a token of Shibli's devotion to Hanafism and its founder. Sayyid Sulaymān Nadwī, Hayāt, p. 69.

2. Ibid., pp. 100-07.

3. Ibid., pp. 822 f.

4. Ibid., p. 816.

Intellectual Modernism of Shibli Nu'mān

Ḥanafism had undergone a radical change with the passage of time. The beginning was so rigid and conservative that, according to him, a person could become a Christian but not a ghayr muqallid.<sup>5</sup> The end was so flexible and liberal that perhaps the single most important reason why he still liked to call himself a Ḥanafite was that, according to him, Ḥanafism eminently symbolised consideration for this-worldly human needs and was best suited for culturally more advanced societies; in other words, because it stood for change and progress.<sup>6</sup>

In the earlier works of Shibli mentioned above his Ḥanafism manifested itself in the confutation of the ghayr muqallidīn and that too in a very trivial matter. But about ten years after, his Ḥanafism appears in Sirat al-Nu'mān in a positive manner.<sup>7</sup> In this work Shibli employs his forceful pen not in disputation with Ahl-i Ḥadīth, but in arguing that Ḥanafite law, which for him is Islamic law par excellence in that it was Abū Ḥanīfah who laid the foundations of the science of fiqh in Islam,<sup>8</sup> is not essentially derived from Roman law, and that it rather had in itself the

5. Muḥammad Mahdī, Tadhkirah-i Shams al-‘Ulamā, p. 6; also quoted in Shaykh Muḥammad Ikram, Shibli Nāmah, p. 33.

6. Al-Nu'mān, p. 267.

7. In his review on this book, Ḥālī praises it as a pioneering work which "lays the foundation of the philosophy of religion in our [Urdu] literature". Maqālāt-i Ḥālī, II, 166.

8. Al-Nu'mān, pp. 246, 251 ff., 275 ff.

Changing Law

necessary materials and conditions for genesis and growth<sup>9</sup>—a clear advance, in fact a jump, in Shibli's outlook, concern and thinking. Whether the worshipper should or should not recite the first sūrah of the Qur'ān behind the leader of the congregational prayer, is no more the bone of contention with Ahl-i Hadīth.<sup>10</sup> What Shibli is out to show now is that the Hanafite law is pre-eminently characterised by reason, facility, expansion and, especially, progress with civilisation.<sup>11</sup> Perhaps in Abū Ḥanīfah he is subconsciously looking for a support for the destined reformulation of the Islamic law in accordance with the needs of the modern age; just as he found in al-Ghazālī a prop for the reconstruction of Islamic theology.<sup>12</sup>

(2)

Although Shibli shows the reasonableness and facility of Hanafite law in matters of ritual,<sup>13</sup> he

9. Ibid.. pp. 283-95, et passim.

10. He mentions it only casually in the course of his narration of the instances of Abū Ḥanīfah's use of reason, as he also mentions the questions of rāf'-i yadayn and āmīn bi al-Jahr. Al-Nu'mān, pp. 110-13, 337 f., 343. Also see Al-Kalām, pp. 221 f.

11. Al-Nu'mān, pp. 296-330.

12. Indeed, Shibli here relates Abū Ḥanīfah's rationalism to the fact that he started his codification of fiqh with a background in 'ilm al-kalām and discussions with the Mu'tazilites, as compared to other faqīhs who started with the problems of fiqh themselves. He even ascribes the irrationalism of Ash'arite kalām to the fact that Abū al-Hasan al-Ash'arī was a follower of al-Shāfi'ī who was inclined towards irrationalism in matters of fiqh. Al-Nu'mān, pp. 296 f., 299; also pp. 40 f., 151 f.

13. Ibid., pp. 296-304.

Intellectual Modernism of Shibli Nu'mānī

is more concerned with that aspect of it which deals with social relations, crimes and punishments, and judicial procedures—in this order. “A very great part of fiqh with which the worldly needs are related is that of mu‘āmalāt,” he writes, “and it is here that the subtleness and ingenuity of a mujtahid can be fully judged.”<sup>14</sup> It goes without saying that Abū Ḥanīfah would come out the winner in comparison with others. Shibli selects a few test-cases to show that the Ḥanafite law is pre-eminently in consonance with civilisation and refinement.

It need hardly be pointed out that the selection of the cases as well as the criteria on which he judged them are both influenced, if not exactly determined, by the priorities and values of Western liberalism. Shibli takes up the institution of marriage and shows that ‘even in the most civilised countries of today the rules of marriage are no better than those in Ḥanafite fiqh’. Indeed as compared to the Roman law whose rules of marriage are, according to Bentham, a “collection of injustices,” the Ḥanafite rules of marriage are a “collection of justices”. The main point he emphasises is that in all the rules of marriage Abū Ḥanīfah has taken into consideration the principle of the equality of man and woman “which distinguishes his fiqh from that of the other a‘immah in this matter”. Indeed, according to

14. Ibid., p. 308.

Changing Law

Abū Hanīfah, a single woman's witness in matters of marriage, divorce, etc., is as reliable as that of a single man; and a woman can even be appointed to the post of qādī. A woman who has reached the age of maturity has the same right as a man to contract her own marriage, and to dissolve it if contracted by the guardian in her immaturity. A woman has the right to khula' without paying any compensation if the man is in the wrong. When it comes to the laws of divorce which are rather strict in Hanafite fiqh, Shībī manages to find yet another civilisational principle behind them, namely, that marriage should be a strong and durable contract.<sup>15</sup>

Another evidence of the civility of the Hanafite law, in fact one of its chief characteristics, is the generous rights it has given to non-Muslims living in a Muslim state, which "no government in the world has ever given to an alien people; Europe, which is proud of its law and justice, can make verbal claims, but cannot offer actual examples". Again, the main thing emphasised is the general legal equality of Muslims and non-Muslims, particularly in the matter of punishment for murder. In his generosity Abū Hanīfah indeed crossed the limit of moderation when he ruled that the contract of protection will not be regarded as void until and unless non-Muslims ganged up against the government. At this point Shibli recalls those harsh and illiberal regulations against non-Muslims which are found in Hanafite works such as Hidāyah (and Fatāwā-i 'Ālamgiri which contains still more severe regulations) and which are reportedly purported to achieve the humiliation of non-Muslims. At first Shibli tries to save the situation by saying that these illiberal regulations are the invention of the jurists of later times (muta'akhkhirin), and thus Abū Hanīfah could not be blamed for them. But Shibli cannot ignore the fact that part of them is reported from Abū Hanīfah himself, and with some additions also from Abū Yūsuf who attributes them to 'Umar I. Shibli accepts this and turns the discussion around the question whether 'Umar issued these regulations to humiliate non-Muslims or to keep them apart from Muslims. In Shibli's view it was for the latter reason that 'Umar issued these regulations. The reason, furthermore, was a matter of 'Umar's personal taste and hence, Shibli means, lacking permanent legal value.<sup>16</sup>

15. Ibid., pp. 310-21; also see pp. 353-56.

Still another proof of the civility and mildness of the Hanafite law is its rules pertaining to punishments. For instances, Abū Hanīfah adds so many qualifications to the definition of theft that the punishment by amputation of the hand of the thief cannot be carried out easily. According to Abū Hanīfah, punishment for murder is the same

16. Ibid., pp. 322-30.

Changing Law

for everyone, whether he or she is free or slave, Muslim or non-Mu-lim; and wilful murder must be punished by execution and not by blood-money.<sup>17</sup>

Shibli is very keen to show the modernity of the Hanafite as compared to other schools of law; but one should note that he is no less concerned with showing that it is also more close to the tradition—to the correct meaning of the Qur'ān and also, contrary to the general belief, to the true hadīth. This, as a matter of fact, he regards as one of the chief characteristics of the Hanafite law, and discusses it in sufficient detail.<sup>18</sup>

(3)

Although Shibli has underlined the true-to-modernity-and-tradition character of the actual content of the Hanafite law, the point he is perhaps more concerned with is that due to the peculiarly urban and civilised circumstances in which it originally evolved at the hands of Abū Ḥanīfah—whose own ingenuity played no small role in its development—the Hanafite law came to acquire certain characteristics or principles which were conducive to further legislation suitable to the ever-new needs and demands of a developing society.<sup>19</sup> The basic and most telling of these principles of law-making as evolved by Abū Ḥanīfah is, according to Shibli, the distinction

17. Ibid., pp. 305-07, 347-51.

18. Ibid., pp. 330-57.

19. See above, refs. 8 and 9.

which Abū Ḥanīfah made between legislative and non-legislative commands, particularly in respect of the Hadīth.<sup>20</sup> But others, as we shall see, turn out to be hardly less important.

Shibli must have been well aware of the crucial importance of clearly defining the role of Hadīth in the process of law-making. He devotes seventy-five pages of Sīrat al-Nu'mānī<sup>21</sup> ostensibly to show that Abū Ḥanīfah, contrary to the prevalent notion, did not disregard Hadīth as a source of law.<sup>22</sup> But with undisguised appreciation Shibli shows in great detail how cautious and critical Abū Ḥanīfah was in accepting a hadīth as true and binding—something which led to a radical curtailment of the use of Hadīth material.<sup>23</sup>

Tracing the gradual evolution of Hadīth material and narration from its very small beginning under the Prophet and underlining the discouragement of its use especially by 'Umar I, on the one hand, and demonstrating the increasing numbers of ahādīth due to fabrications and careless narrations after the fitnah, on the other, Shibli contends that

"the volume of Hadīth material which had already come into existence by the time of Abū Ḥanīfah was full of fabricated, erroneous, weak and interpolated Traditions . . . he laid the foundation of the criticism of Traditions and established its principles, and rules."<sup>24</sup>

20. Al-Nu'mānī, p. 269.

21. Ibid., pp. 170-245.

22. Ibid., pp. 170-85.

23. Ibid., pp. 186-245.

24. Ibid., pp. 186-95.

Changing Law

For instance, Abū Ḥanīfah held that “only that hadīth is authoritative which the narrator heard himself and remembered till the time of narration,” even if he had it in writing.<sup>25</sup> Though he accepted riwāyat bi al-ma’ni, he limited it to the Companions and the Successors and tended to further condition it with tafaqquh.<sup>26</sup> Moreover, Abū Ḥanīfah also applied the principles of dirāyat in Hadīth criticism. For instance, he held that “a hadīth which is against irrefutable reason (‘aql-i qat’i) is not trustworthy”; or, that “a Tradition which is not higher than akhbār-i ahād in status will be doubtful if it relates such events as occur daily to all the people.”<sup>27</sup> Finally, he used the hidden reason (‘illat-i khafīyyah)—for which a knack or taste is developed through constantly looking into the underlying reasons and ultimate causes (asrār-o maṣāliḥ) of the shari‘ah—in judging the veracity of Traditions.<sup>28</sup>

The application of these principles cut down quite drastically the amount of Hadīth material accepted as useful and reliable.<sup>29</sup> But Abū Ḥanīfah did not stop here.

“There is not the slightest difference [Shibli says] between the Hadīth and the Qur’ān from the point of view of their authoritative nature; one is recited revelation (wahy matlū’) and the other is unrecited (ghayr matlū’). Whatever difference

25. Ibid., pp. 199 ff., 203.

25. Ibid., pp. 209 f., 203-08.

27. Ibid., pp. 214 ff., 216 ff.

28. Ibid., pp. 221-26.

29. Ibid., pp. 200-03, 209 f., 214-16, 224, 226.

Intellectual Modernism of Shibli Nu'māni

there may be is seen in the proof of the authenticity of a hadīh; if a hadīh is attested with the same inescapability and certainty as the Qur'ān, then it is equal to the Qur'ān in the establishment of the commands. But the degrees of the authenticity of the Hadīh are different; and these differences need to be taken into account in the establishment of the commands."

Abū Hnīfah, accordingly, graded the ahādīth, with respect to their authenticity and their legal effectiveness, into mutawātir, mashhūr and ahād. While mutawātir can establish fardīyyah and ruk-nīyyah, and mashhūr can restrict an unrestricted command in the Qur'ān and make an addition to it, ahād, since it is zanni al-thubūt, can have no effect on the textual (mansūṣah) commands of the Qur'ān.<sup>30</sup> This, in effect, meant that a legist could have more discretion in arriving at legal judgments, since Hadīh material comprises overwhelmingly these akhbār-i ahād.

Shibli devotes full fifteen pages to discussing and demonstrating on his own the assumptions involved at various levels in the affirmation of akhbār-i ahād. Thus he demolishes the connectedness (ittisāl) of the marfū' and ma'an'an Traditions on this basis, and also shows the assumptive nature of the rijāl criticism on which rest all the akhbār-i ahād. Finally, riwāyat bi al-ma'nā, which accounts for the majority of such ahādīth, is in itself pregnant with all kinds of assumptions.

30. Ibid., pp. 226 ff.

Changing Law

"The attitude which Abū Ḥanīfah adopted in this matter was [according to Shībī] very moderate, and a proof of the finesse of his mind; he neither rejected them totally, like the Mu'tazilites, nor accepted them as certain with the credulity of the superficial observers."<sup>31</sup>

On this already severely reduced material of true and binding ahādīth Shībī brings into play Abū Ḥanīfah's distinction between legislative (tashrī'i) and non legislative (ghayr tashrī'i) commands and ahādīth, which further cuts into the authenticated but graded Hadīth material. He introduces the subject with a reference to Shāh Wali Allah who also made a similar distinction among the ahādīth, setting off those which are the proper concern of Prophethood (indicated by the Qur'ānic verse: mā ātākumu al Rasūl fa khudhūhu wa mā nahākum 'anhu fa intahū) from those which are not (indicated by the Prophetic Tradition: innamā anā basharun idhā amartukum bi shay'in min dīnikum fakhudhūhu wā idhā amartukum bi shay'in min ra'yī fa innamā anā bashar). In the second category he included things such as what the Prophet did habitually ('ādatan) or accidentally (ittifāqan) or said in accordance with the ideas of his people; or adopted on account of partial exigency (maṣlahat-i juz'i), which is not binding on all the people; for example, the prescription of a rite (shi'ār ki ta'yīn). It is because of the latter that 'Umar I said: "Why should we do ramal now, when God destroyed the people for whose benefit we used to do it?" Many other commands of the Prophet fall into this category; for instance, his command that "the person who slays an infidel in battle will be the owner of his arms."<sup>32</sup>

31. Ibid., pp. 231-45.

Intellectual Modernism of Shibli Nu'mani

Shāh Wali Allāh was an example nearer home, but the credit for first conceiving of distinction between legislative and non-legislative ahādīth goes, according to Shibli, to Abū Hanīfah. It was on account of this distinction that Abū Hanīfah regarded the ahādīth concerning the major ritual ablution on Friday, the women's going out to 'Id prayers, the effectuation of divorce, the fixing of poll-tax, the designation of the tribute and the distribution of the booty as non-legislative. "The great advantage which the Hanafite law has over against laws of other schools is," according to Shibli, "that its rules are generally based on this principle. That is the reason why it has that expansiveness and freedom which are lacking in the rules of other a'imma." Abū Hanīfah adopted this principle, Shibli believes, because he had the precedents of the Pious Caliphs before him, by which Shibli mostly means what are generally known as awwaliyāt-i 'Umar I. These include: 'Umar's interdiction against the sale and purchase of ummahāt-i awlād; 'Umar's conversion of "three divorces" into definite divorce; and Abū Bakr's setting forty lashes as punishment for drinking and then 'Umar's raising it to eighty. In such matters the Pious Caliphs acted against the Prophet's commands knowing that they were not legislative.<sup>33</sup>

32. Ibid., pp. 269-71.

Changing Law

At this point the question may arise: how one did or could distinguish between legislative and non-legislative ahādīth? Shibli had probably this question in mind when he wrote that because of their constant association with the Prophet, the Companions "had become cognizant of the nuances of the shari'ah and it was very easy for them to distinguish the legislative commands from those that fell in the category regarding which the Prophet had said: antum a'lamu bi umūri dunyākum. That is how (namely, by following the method of the Companions) Abū Hanīfah distinguished between the two,<sup>34</sup> and that is perhaps how Shibli would want us to distinguish between the two. We shall have more to say on this later. At the moment we should part company with Abū Hanīfah and go along with Shibli to Shāh Wali Allāh, whose importance we have already seen in connection with the distinction between legislative and non-legislative ahādīth, for a still more revolutionary principle of law-making in Islam.

(4)

Having dealt with the Hadīth material in the

33. Ibid., pp. 271-73.

34. Ibid., pp. 273 f. ; also see p. 272.

Intellectual Modernism of Shibli Nu'mani

manner described above, Shibli was still left with a great deal of material, Traditional as well as Qur'anic, which looked indisputably legislative in nature, and which posed difficult problems in this civilised, progressive world of his. In order to find a way, to put it rather bluntly, around the implications of this material, he fell back upon the role of usages and customs in the formation of the shari'ah. We have already seen in the previous chapter<sup>35</sup> how Shibli referred to Shāh Wali Allāh in his argument for keeping the respective domains of religion and science apart. There, only the things which did not pertain to the refinement of the self (tahdhīb al-nafs) and administration of the community (siyāsat al-ummah)—such as natural, and even historical, events—were not the proper concern of the Prophets. Now it was the turn of the shari'ah itself, and the question was how much of it was religiously relevant and binding.

In a section of his Al-Kalām entitled “Prophets’ method of instruction and guidance,”<sup>36</sup> Shibli develops his ideas on the universals and particulars in the shari'ahs of the Prophets in general and the shari'ah of the Prophet Muḥammad in particular, with the help of Shāh Wali Allāh. Quoting extensively from Shāh Wali Allāh’s Hujjat Allāh al-Bālighah at every stage, Shibli first establishes the principle that in the formulation of their respective shari'ahs, the Prophets adopt and preach, with suitable (but never radical, and only when necessary) changes, the social, economic, judicial and other usages and customs of the people to whom they are sent.<sup>37</sup> Then Shibli goes on to distinguish between two parts of the shari'ahs. One, those beliefs and matters which constitute the universal principles of religion and in respect of which the shari'ahs are united, such as the existence and unity of God, reward and punishment in the Hereafter, worship, veneration for sha'ā'ir Allāh, marriage, inheritance, etc. Two, those rules and practices which are particular to various Prophets and on the basis of which it is said, for instance, that the shari'ah of Moses is different from that of Jesus. This part of shari'ahs is based on the requirements and interests of specific peoples or countries, and is founded mainly on those ideas, beliefs, habits, business relations, conventions, way of living and principle of civilisation which already exist in that people.

35. See above, pp. 6-7.

36. Al-Kalām, pp. 108-15.

Changing Law

“That was the reason [Shibli quotes directly from Shāh Wali Allāh] why camels' meat was prescribed to Banī Isrā'īl but not to Banī Ismā'īl; why the distinction between good and bad food was made in consideration of the habits of the Arabs; and why marriage with the sister's daughter was forbidden in our religion but not among the Jews.”<sup>38</sup>

As long as the Prophets were being sent to specific peoples, they could formulate their shari'ahs with special consideration to the customs and

37. Ibid., pp. 108 f.

38. Ibid., pp. 109-11.

Intellectual Modernism of Shibli Nu'mani

characteristics of those peoples; and that was that. But this principle cannot work in the method of instruction of a Prophet who is sent to the whole world, Shibli argues following Shāh Walī Allāh, since he can neither formulate separate shari'ahs for all the different peoples of the world, nor can the customs and characteristics of all these peoples conform with each other. Consequently, he starts with the instruction and education of his own people and makes them a model of good morals; these people serve as his limbs, and on its pattern he goes on widening the circle of his instruction. Although his shari'ah mostly contains those universal rules and general principles which are common to almost all the peoples of the world, yet the consideration of the customs and characteristics of his own people is prominent. But the ordinances which are formed on the basis of these customs and conditions are neither meant to be an end in themselves (maqṣūd bi al-dhāt) nor are they much emphasised. To quote Shāh Walī Allāh's own words:

"Therefore, there is not a better and simpler way than to take into consideration, in matters of sha'ā'ir, hudūd and irtifāqāt, the customs of the people to whom he [a Prophet? The Prophet?] is sent; and the people coming after should not be pressed hard about these matters."<sup>39</sup>

This led Shibli to conclude finally that

39. Ibid., pp. 113 f.

Changing Law

"it will become apparent from this principle, to what extent the customs of Arabia have been taken into consideration in determining the punishments in Islamic shari'ah of theft, fornication, murder, etc., and how far it is necessary to be bound with exactly the same, specific punishments."<sup>40</sup>

These words speak for themselves and hardly need any comment. However, one should mention as a matter of record that, though Shibli never spelled out positively his attitude towards the Qur'an as a source of law, he obviously did not regard the Qur'anic nusūs, at least those which pertained to criminal law, as final and eternal.

(5)

Shibli had come a long way from petty squabbling in defence of the Hanafite position on minor points of law to raising fundamental questions of lasting value about the principles of law-making in Islam. This should not, however, give the impression that he had cut himself off from Hanafism. In the first place, he had no reason to do so inasmuch as he believed that the Hanafite law, if any, was the most suitable one for the changing times. Secondly, we know that in his last article on law, "Masā'il-i Fiqhiyyah par Zamāne kī Darūraton ka Athar,"<sup>41</sup> Shibli again fell back upon a Hanafite jurist, and a very late one at that, namely, Ibn al-'Abidin Shami (1784-1836), to seek support for his stand on the role of changing customs and needs in law-making. Two things should, however, be noted here. One, that not once does Shibli refer to the fact that Shami is a Hanafite, or even give the slightest impression of promoting the cause of Hanafism. Two, that the thing uppermost in his mind is the Islamic law as such in relation to the changing times.

40. Ibid., p. 115. See also Aziz Ahmad, Islamic Modernism, p. 255 Cf. Mi'rāj Muhammad, "Shāh Wali Allāh's Attempt to Reconcile the Schools of Fiqh," Unpublished M.A. Thesis, McGill University, Montreal, 1968, pp. 49-55, for an interpretation of Shāh Wali Allāh on this point, contradicting the one made by Shibli and other modernists, such as Iqbal.

Intellectual Modernism of Shibli Nu'mani

Shibli begins the article thus:

"Our opponents have said it hundreds of times before and say it even now that Islām kā qanūn (masā'il-i fiqhīyyah) is a dead limb (dast-i shall) which cannot move by any means; that is, it does not have the capacity for progress and, therefore, cannot go along with the needs of the time."<sup>42</sup>

Responding to the objection that his counter-stand in this matter is "the result of the new ideas, otherwise, according to the ancients of Islam, there is no room for modification and alteration in the matter of fiqh," Shibli comes up with Shami to vindicate his position. The article consists mostly of quotes from two treatises by Shami, especially his Nashr al-'Urf fi Binā' Ba'd al-Ahkām 'alā al-'Urf.<sup>43</sup>

The effect to which Shibli is quoting Shami is that, except for those which are established by

41. Maqālāt, I, 75-81.

42. Ibid., I, 75.

43. Ibid.

Changing Law

a clear nass, the rest of the masā'il i fiqhīyyah, which are established by ijtihād and rā'y and are mostly based on the custom of the mujtahid's time, will change with the change of time,

"either because of the alteration of custom or the occurrence of a new need or the corruption of the people. For [the quotation continues] if the earlier ruling persisted, it would result in hardship and harm to the people, and in opposition to the fundamentals of the shari'ah, which are based on relief and facilitation and removal of harm and corruption."<sup>44</sup>

After giving a few examples from Shāmī of change of rules on account of the change of customs,<sup>45</sup> Shibli raises the question, again following Shāmī: "If the rulings of the shari'ah can change with the change of time, where will this process end? Can it not encroach upon the religious duties themselves? Can the duties and pillars (farā'id awr arkān) also change with the change of time?" The answer is: If the new custom is not incompatible with al-dalīl al-shar'i in so absolute a manner as to necessitate the abandonment of the nass (for instance, in cases where dalīl is general or analogical), then the custom will be upheld, provided it is common, as the particulariser (mukhaṣṣis) of al-dalīl al-shar'i.<sup>46</sup>

At this point we should ask a question ourselves: why has Shibli gone to all this trouble of quoting extensively from Shāmī? Not, we believe,

44. Ibid., I, 75 f.

45. Ibid., I, 77.

46. Ibid., I, 78-80.

Intellectual Modernism of Shibli Nu'mānī

because he was interested in establishing the finality and permanent validity of the nusūs. But because he wanted to stress the principle of movement and change in the Islamic law, and to avail of still another device for making new adjustments with progressing time. He says in conclusion:

"After these clear statements who can claim that Islamic law lacks the capacity to progress and to conform with the needs of the time. Hundreds and thousands of particular matters relating to mu'amalāt, which have come into existence these days, are declared lawful or unlawful simply because they are subordinated to some old general principles; otherwise, it is obvious that these particular matters did not exist at that time. But 'Allāmah Shāmī has proved on the basis of hundreds of Traditions that the application of the general principles (kulliyāt) is restricted due to common-culture."<sup>47</sup>

Thus by limiting the role of Hadīth and enlarging the role of custom ('ādah, 'urf) in the process of law-making, Shibli has, perhaps unwittingly, thrown the field of fresh legislation in Islam wide open. From his point of view there seems hardly any part of shari'ah, at least in the socio-economic domain, which is not subject to change. This is not surprising in view of the fact that to him Islam essentially meant beliefs, rituals, and morals.<sup>48</sup>

47. Ibid., I, 80 f.

48. Al-Kalām, p. 1. He writes at another place: "The task of religion is to purify the soul and cure the spiritual maladies. But just as a straw, in order to grow and develop, needs the whole magnificent structure of the world, so the religion also has to do with politics, civilisation, philosophy, in short, every branch of life; and the root

Changing Law

Under the aggressive attacks of the Western critics of Islam, he was virtually forced to take up arms and to show the excellence of the age-old social institutions of Islam by contemporary Western standards and value criteria. Put on the defensive he even went to the extent of deliberately making the socio-legal institutions of Islam an essential part of his new kalām.<sup>49</sup> Left alone, he, and perhaps many others, would have responded differently, more creatively to the intellectual-cultural stimuli of the West.<sup>50</sup>

But the question still remains: how far would Shibli have gone? Was there anything of lasting, universal value in the societal norms of Islamic shari'ah? Put like that, Shibli would surely have answered the question in the affirmative. What he would not have found easy to specify, perhaps no one who has once been exposed to the human flux called history could, is the name of that something universal and lasting. Any decision in this regard would remain, in the final analysis, arbit-and basis of all these exists in the teachings of the principles of Islam" (Khuṭbāt, p. 161). It would take a Mawdūdī to turn this organic relationship between spiritual and material to an almost mechanical one.

49. See above, p. 46. Also see Al-Kalām, pp. 143-67. In fact, at one point he refers to them as the subject-matter of an entirely new theology (bilkul nayā 'ilm-i kalām) of Islam (ibid., p. 6).

50. Cf. Fazlur Rahman, Islam, p. 213; idem, "Revival and Reform in Islam," op. cit., II, 641; W.C. Smith, Islam in Modern History, p. 92; idem, "Islam Confronted by Western Secularism: Revolutionary Reaction," in Dorothea Seelye Franck, Ed., Islam in the Modern World, p. 25.

rary in the sense that it would primarily be based on practical considerations of an ever-changing world.

(6)

We saw above how Shibli effectively curtailed the all-inclusiveness of Islamic law and "floated" the normative in it; so much so that in the end its formulation was, in effect, left to the whims of a changing time or, to put it more appropriately, made consequent upon the dialogue between human reason and God's will. This was the position Shibli had taken in principle or would seem to have taken by the logic of his own statements. Let us now see how he stands in relation to the actual social-legal problems of his day, particularly in relation to the sensitive question of women's liberation. Does he abide by the fluid principle that "the expediencies (maṣlahat) of the shari'ah are bound up with time and the time is bound up with them"?<sup>51</sup> To anticipate the conclusion, let us state that on the whole he does.

We have already seen Shibli vaguely trying to show the equality of man and woman in the Hanafite law.<sup>52</sup> That was insignificant in comparison with his more substantive ideas on the question of women's education and social participation. While his views on the former are too unequivocally stated to leave any doubt in the matter, his stand on the latter has been thrown into confusion on account of an article entitled "Pardah awr Islām" which Shibli wrote in the latter period of his life.<sup>53</sup> On the basis of this article and a few other statements of his it is generally believed and claimed that Shibli was not only a staunch supporter of pardah, but also regarded it as a precept of Islam in the implied sense that it was of a permanent legal value.<sup>54</sup> Nothing can be farther from the true intent of Shibli here or elsewhere. On a superficial reading of the said article one may tend to regard it as an inconsistent, conservative piece in an otherwise fairly modern, liberal composition of Shibli's thought. One may even be tempted to explain it away simply by saying that since at the time when he wrote it Shibli was trying to work in and through the 'ulamā', therefore, he made an expedient concession to them. We need not resort to such devices since a close perusal of the article reveals that he did not actually compromise his position.

51. Baqiyat, p. 22.

52. See above, pp. 60-61.

Changing Law

It should be noted that the article was written as a belated answer to an article by Ameer Ali published in one of the issues of the journal Nineteenth Century of the year 1899. In his article Ameer Ali had stated that the institution of pardah was a very late development in Islam, beginning, in

53. Maqālāt, I, 103-20.

54. Sayyid Sulaymān Nadwī, as quoted in Sbaykh Muḥammad Ikrām, op. cit., p. 157.

Intellectual Modernism of Shibli Nu'mani

fact, in the middle of the seventh century of Hijrah, with the coming of the Mongol "strangers" and the disintegration of the Caliphate. Ameer Ali further maintained that in the days of the Caliphs the women of the higher class used to appear before men without the cloak (burqa').<sup>55</sup> Shibli is taking issue with Ameer Ali on these two points. He demonstrates at length, on the one hand, that pardah in its various forms—and not always exclusively for women either—existed in Arabia long before Islam and was regularised and made compulsory by it, and, on the other hand, that it was precisely among the upper-class women that it was particularly in vogue as compared to the lower-class women and slave-girls.<sup>56</sup> Thus Shibli is interested here, and he says as much, in the "historical aspect" of the problem and in rectifying a misconception as to the abiding practice in the entire Muslim world concerning pardah.<sup>57</sup> Indeed, he makes it clear at the very outset that "if the matter had been discussed from a rational standpoint, then we would not have felt the need to intervene; but it is also claimed that Islam does not prescribe it and, more than that, it was not conventionalised in the early centuries of Islam".<sup>58</sup> It can be noticed that Shibli is simply stating that pardah is a religious injunction, and that, too, more as a fact of history than as a fact

55. Maqālāt, I, 103.

56. Ibid., I, 105-12, 115.

57. Ibid., I, 104.

58. Ibid., I, 103.

Changing Law

of religion. At any rate, nowhere does he say that it is absolute or unchangeable. In fact, if one may be permitted to draw any conclusion from the fact that Shibli is linking the origin and development of the idea and institution of pardah with the evolving social distinctions and protectivism, following in the wake of the onward march of civilisation, we would say that he was not inclined towards bestowing a permanent character upon pardah.<sup>59</sup> This should take care, for the time being, of the legal aspect of the issue. Not less instructive is it to find out Shibli's personal leanings in this matter.

Although Shibli has avoided making any moral judgment in favour of or against pardah in this article, he has not been so reticent elsewhere. In his Safarnāmah Shibli wrote very favourably of the loose silken gown, head-cover and the fine muslin kerchief over the lower half of the face, which the Turkish women put on when going out. He, indeed, refers to two young Turkish girls, who were introduced to him, as "goddesses of chastity".<sup>60</sup> On the other hand, he also applauds the Begam of Bhopal for managing the affairs of the state from behind the pardah. "The example of the esteemed lady is a rejoinder to those who assert that women cannot become proficient remaining in pardah," he says.<sup>61</sup> Likewise, Shibli commends in the same breath Qasim Amin's Tahrir

59. Ibid., I, 103-08.

61. Maqālāt, VIII, 109.

60. Safarnāmah, pp. 131 f.

Intellectual Modernism of Shibli Nu'māni

al-Mar'ah and al-Mar'at al-Jadīdah as well as Faīd Wajdī's Al-Mar'at al-Muslimah which was written as a rebuttal to Qāsim Amīn.<sup>62</sup> One may well ask what Shibli is trying to prove by making now one statement, now another. The answer probably is that the poor man was caught in the middle. While this may partly be due to a genuine intellectual dilemma as to what is more useful for the society, it must partly also be due to the sensitiveness and the immediate social relevance of the issue of pardah in the conservative Indian Muslim society in general, and in the circles of 'ulamā', among whom during the last years of his life Shibli was trying to achieve a breakthrough,<sup>63</sup> in particular. When one deals with 'ulamā', one is virtually walking on eggs. Shibli had to adopt a cautious line. He must have been half out of his wits trying to keep the precarious balance between his personal inclinations and an unreceptive audience. That is probably what gave birth to such

62. Makārib, I, 234; Maqālāt, V, 136-38.

63. In a letter to his friend, Mahdī Ḥasan, Shibli discloses that his plan to revolutionise the thinking of 'ulamā' can be accomplished only in stages. "... If I had shown my hand in Ghazālī, 'ulamā' would have been lost to me for years, even for generations to come; and I do not want to cut myself off from them" (Shaykh Muḥammad Ikrām, op. cit., p. 113). Shibli advised Abū al-Kalām <sup>to</sup> maintain the guise of mawlawiyyat, as it may be usefully employed (ibid., pp. 176 f.). Interesting though the idea may be, it will be an exaggeration to hold, as S.A.A. Rizvi does, that "Shibli . . . had come to believe that an oligarchy of the 'ulamā' under his own leadership might control the Indian Muslim politics" ("The Breakdown of Traditional Society," Cambridge History of Islam, II, 93).

Changing Law

disparate statements. What is remarkable, however, is that he was still able to commend Qāsim Amīn's works which were generally condemned in Egypt itself until as late as 1918.<sup>64</sup> As a matter of fact, Shibli was able to do much more than that. People may have different views about Shibli's stand regarding pardah, but there cannot be two opinions about his very modern and liberal ideas on the education and social participation of women—omelets he could probably make without breaking the eggs.

In the above-mentioned article Shibli makes a distinction between applications of the word pardah: one in the sense of the covering of the face and body, which was a pre-Islamic custom; and the other in the sense of segregation from the male sex, which did not exist in pre-Islamic Arabia. While he mentions that pardah in the former sense was adopted in Islam, Shibli leaves out, purposely we think, any discussion of the pardah in Islam in the latter sense.<sup>65</sup> This should be taken to mean that Shibli was making an exception of it. This inference has at least as much validity as the other inference that he was in favour of covering the face and body. But we have more positive and direct evidence on the subject. In the "civilisation and progress" of the contemporary Turks the one thing which Shibli finds "most valuable and

64. Musalmān 'Awrat ki Azādī, p. 7 of the Introduction.

65. Maqālat, I, 105-08.

Intellectual Modernism of Shibli Nu'māni

worthy of imitation" is the "women's education and social conduct". Why? Because, in Shibli's opinion, it follows a middle course between the objectionable extremes of the Asians and Europeans, and partakes of their respective virtues. To be more specific, Turkish women are modern, educated and socially active, but modest and pardah-observing. In numerous public and private schools, they are taught, besides other substantive courses, French and, at some places, also music. They can get even technical education. Moreover, they have freedom of movement. They go out to markets and entertainment parks, and participate in parties and academic gatherings. Shibli is particularly appreciative of Turkish women educationists and writers.<sup>66</sup>

This was Shibli's first exposure to a semi-Western feminist culture in an Islamic society. And it remained his ideal until the very last. That was the ideal he searched in medieval, especially Indian, Islam,<sup>67</sup> and that was the ideal which he wanted realised among contemporary Indian Muslim women. That was partly the reason for his infatuation with 'Atiyyah Begam Faydī, and for his further encouragement to her in this direction.<sup>68</sup> It is a measure of Shibli's liberal-mindedness in this regard that he was even willing to let

66. Safarnāmah, pp. 130 f.

67. Maqālāt, IV, 56, 60-63; V, 112.

68. Khuṭūṭ, passim.

Changing Law

‘Atīyyah Begam attend a meeting of the Nadwat al-‘Ulamā’ and to let her elder sister, the Begam of Janjīrah, lay the foundation stone of the new building of Dār al-‘Ulūm of Nadwah.<sup>69</sup> One may perhaps want to disregard these as exceptional cases, but one cannot ignore Shibli’s ideas on an adequate syllabus for women, which he expresses in his letters to ‘Atīyyah Begam. In one of his letters he says:

“I am totally against having a separate syllabus for women. This is a fundamental error into which even Europe is falling. Effort should be made to decrease the distance which has been created between the two sexes and not to increase it and let their respective manners, habits and tastes become disparate. If the divergence goes on increasing like this, both will eventually become two separate species. An American lady has written a nice book on this subject. . . . However, courses on child-nursing and-education, etc., should be added to women’s syllabus.”<sup>70</sup>

In another letter he writes:

“You are of the opinion that women should study the worldly and economic sciences less [than men]. You do not like that women should earn their livelihood and sustain themselves. But remember that all the wrongs which men have done to women were on account of the fact that women were dependent on them . . . as long as women will continue to be frail, men will not give them their full rights.”<sup>71</sup>

It is interesting to compare these radical ideas

69. Ibid., p. 108.

70. Ibid., pp. 46 f.

71. Ibid., p. 53.

Intellectual Modernism of Shibli Nu'mani

of Shibli with those of Sayyid Ahmad Khan. The last mentioned was totally against imparting new education to women. His words are: "it is against my wish that you should start studying the presently current profane (nāmubārak) books instead of those holy books which your grandmothers have been reading."<sup>72</sup>

Above, we saw incidentally that Shibli finds nothing objectionable in learning music, even by women.<sup>73</sup> The question of the lawfulness or otherwise of music did not seem to bother him at all. The same is true with regard to the pictures of living beings. He dares not publish a photo in Al-Nadwah,<sup>74</sup> but he is proud of the medieval Muslim contribution to painting.<sup>75</sup> He is aware of its prohibition in Islam, but is not worried at all by the fact. "We are not concerned with the religious dictum, but the historical fact is that the Muslims were not less advanced in this art," he says.<sup>76</sup> What is one supposed to make of these views? That Shibli was knowingly flouting a precept of Islam? Hardly that, we would say. It would be

72. Sayyid Ahmad Khan, Mukammal Majmū'ah-i Laykcharz, p. 251.

73. See above, p. 84. See also his letters to 'Atīyyah Begam Faydī, in which he encourages her in this direction. He himself claimed to be versed in the art. Khuṭūṭ, pp. 64-66, 93 f.

74. Makātib, II, 217. 75. Maqālāt, IV, 96; Makātib, I, 278.

76. Maqālāt, IV, 96; he not only let his own pictures taken, but was very pleased when a noted artist, indeed the husband of 'Atīyyah Begam, did a painting of his which won a prize in a Paris exhibition. Makātib, I, 284 f.

Changing Law

more in line with his thinking, unless we have completely failed to understand Shibli, to give to a practice legal validity of its own and prefer it to an ineffective precept. This also seems to go with his stand on pardah (in the sense of veil). Since it was a common practice, according to Shibli, it cannot be done away with lightly. The only thing which can invalidate a practised precept is an urgent social need, examples of which we are going to see presently.

Shibli not only agreed with Shāh 'Abd al-'Azīz's famous fatwā that India is dar al-amn and ribā is lawful in it, but also wrote an independent treatise on this subject in which he went one step further and argued that bank interest (munāfa') is not usury (sūd).<sup>77</sup> Another, more telling example is that during the Balkan Wars Shibli gave a fatwā, as perhaps did a few others, that, instead of sacrificing animals on the occasion of 'Id al-Adhā', their price should be given in aid to the Turks. He went ahead and said that the latter has superiority (afḍaliyyat) over the former.<sup>78</sup> Last but not least, Shibli made an earnest effort to prove that waqf-i awlad is an essential precept of Islam, and to have it enforced as a law by the government.<sup>79</sup> Why? Simply because the land-holding Muslim families were being ruined by the division

77. We could not get hold of this risālah. Probably it was never published. The statement made above is based on Sulaymān Nadwi's brief description of it. Makārib, II, 165.

78. Ibid., I, 342 f.

79. Maqālat, I, 81-102.

Intellectual Modernism of Shibli Nu'mānī

of inheritance into small units, not all of which fell to the lot of competent persons.<sup>80</sup> Very conveniently Shibli forgot the basic law of inheritance of Islam which he had praised elsewhere, for quite the opposite reasons, as one of the most important socio-economic institutions of Islam.<sup>81</sup>

80. Maqālāt-i Sar Sayyid, V, 97.

81. Al-Kalām, pp. 161 ff.

III

---

Liberal Politics

(1)

As an introduction to Shibli's political thinking we may as well begin with what his biographer says on the subject:

"In view of the attachment he had with Islam, Islamic civilisation, history, sciences and arts, it was only natural that he should hold dear the rule of Islam and should wish to see the picture he had been looking at in the books realised in actuality; and that, on the other hand, he should fully turn away from those rude hands which plucked out the flowers of the garden of Islam. His politics was precisely this."<sup>1</sup>

Avoid the temptation of imputing any idea of revivalism and pan-Islamism (Afghānī type) to it and there is no doubt that the fountainhead of Shibli's politics, on an inter-Islamic level, was a sense of the community of Islam. The universality of the millat, he says in a verse, "extends over 'Irāq, Fāris, Najd, Hijāz and Qayrawān'.<sup>2</sup> It was this sense of the community of Islam which made

1. Sayyid Sulaymān Nadwī, Hayāt, p. 585.

2. Kulliyāt, p. 59.

Intellectual Modernism of Shibli Nu'māni

him, a British subject, take interest in the vicissitudes of the Ottoman Empire. And then it is perhaps also true that it was this inter-Islamic involvement which, however paradoxical it may seem, drove him to the politics of an entirely different nature in his own native land—the British of course providing the necessary bridge between the two.

Shibli did not write extensively on the subject of contemporary Islamic or Indian politics. In fact, it is noteworthy that, except for a few articles, and a few references in his letters, all that Shibli has written on politics is in poetry (though he is reported to have talked a lot about it in private meetings).<sup>3</sup> A considerable portion of his Kulliyāt consists of poems on political themes. This may be taken to indicate how great was the role of emotions in Shibli's politics.<sup>4</sup> It was perhaps this excess of emotions in political matters which made Shibli almost a romantic on the inter-Islamic level and, in a different sense, perhaps also in the Indian sphere.

(2)

Despite the fact that since after the 1857 up-

3. Sayyid Sulaymān Nadwī, op. cit., pp. 590, 609.

4. This is further corroborated by his own admission that "despite having composed thousand[s] of verses, I do not at all have command over poetical composition; that is, I cannot write a single word except under some special, sudden influence" (Makātib, I, 308). Sulaymān Nadwī has also underlined this fact in his Foreword to Shibli's Kulliyāt (pp. 1 f.).

Liberal Politics

rising India had come under the direct rule of the British Government, there was a considerable section of Indian Muslims who had recognised from some time in the past the Ottoman claim to the universal Islamic caliphate—a recognition which, though religious in nature, was not devoid of political implications. All was well as long as Britain itself pursued a pro-Ottoman policy and even encouraged this attitude among Indian Muslims. But with the manifest shift in British policy regarding the Ottomans, in the last decades of the nineteenth century, tension began to develop between the two loyalties.<sup>5</sup> Sayyid Ahmad Khān reacted in the following manner:

“We Muslims living in India are the subjects of the British Government . . . it is our religious duty to be well-wishing and loyal to the British Government . . . we are not the subjects of Sultān ‘Abd al-Hamīd Khān, may God perpetuate his power, nor has he any kind of authority over us or our country. He neither is, nor can be, a caliph over us according to shari‘ah or religion. If he has any right to caliphate, then it is confined to his own country and to the Muslims living under his sway.”<sup>6</sup>

This statement is typical of Sayyid Ahmad Khān’s stand in the matter during 1880’s and 1890’s.

To the great chagrin of his apologists, Shibli also took precisely the same stand in this matter, as is indicated by his article, “Khilāfat,” which

5. Aziz Ahmad, Islamic Modernism, pp. 123 f.

6. Sayyid Ahmad Khān, Akhīrī Mađāmin, pp. 32 f.

Intellectual Modernism of Shibli Nu'mani

appeared in 1899. Though the article is incomplete, the meaning is abundantly clear: submission to the Ottoman Caliphate is not a precept of religion, nor a fact of history, for the Muslims who are not living under the Turkish Sultanate.<sup>7</sup> As late as 1908, Shibli wrote another article, "Musalmān ko Ghayr Madhab Hukumat kā Mahkūm ho kar kiyūn-kar Rahnā Chāhiye," in which he tried to show, on the basis of the Qur'an, Hadīth, fiqh and history, that Muslims should remain loyal to whichever government they might have occasion to live under. In connection with this Shibli cites the precedent of Nasīr al-Dīn al-Ṭūsī who even destroyed Islam out of his loyalty to Halākū; "though I do not like it," he adds. The article ends with a Persian couplet: "We have not read the story of Alexander and Darius; do not ask from me except the story of affection and loyalty."<sup>8</sup> Whether out of conviction or caution or both, Shibli does not give the slightest indication of any doubt as to the lawfulness of the subject status of Indian Muslims under the British Government and the invalidity of any political implications of the Ottoman claim in this respect. On this issue he and Sayyid Ahmad Khan thought alike.

7. Maqālāt, I, 179-84. Sulaymān Nadwī claims that Shibli's views on the subject were different from that of Sayyid Ahmad Khān (op. cit., p. 587) He further claims that Shibli did not write the article out of his own free will, but was made to write it. Without disclosing the hidden hand behind this article, Nadwī merely offers the fact that it was left incomplete as an argument for its having been written under pressure (ibid., p. 631) At another place he offers still another defence: the article was descriptive, not prescriptive (ibid., p. 142).

8. Maqālāt, I, 165-71. Once again Sulaymān Nadwi felt the need to explain the article away and said, "this [the article] was as if the price paid for the annual grant of [Rs.] 6000 which it [the Government] had sanctioned for the Dār al-'Ulūm [of Nadwah]" (op. cit., p. 632).

This did not, however, prevent Shibli, as it did not prevent Sayyid Ahmad Khan,<sup>9</sup> from wishing sincerely the consolidation and perpetuation of the government of their co-religionists, the Ottomans. One should note in this connection that in 1892 Shibli visited Constantinople and a few other Egyptian and Syrian towns. Afterwards he wrote a Safarnāmah in which he praised many an educational and social institution of the Turkish Sultanate and made no attempt to hide his feelings for the Sultan.<sup>10</sup> Moreover, in 1896, he wrote a brief article on the Armenian Question. In this article Shibli blamed the British for inciting the Armenians against the Turkish Government, showed the Porte's benevolent treatment of them and maintained that, contrary to the British news reports, Armenia was becoming pacified.<sup>11</sup>

The only difference between Shibli and Sayyid Ahmad Khan was that when there were occasions of conflict between the two loyalties, one political-concrete-British, the other religious-spectral-

9. Muhammed Amin Zubayri, Dhikr-i Shibli, pp. 48 f., 54 f.

10. See above, p. 84; see below, p. 95.

11. Maqālāt, VIII, 185-89.

Intellectual Modernism of Shibli Nu'mani

Turkish, Shibli, in his Islamic zeal, would sometimes forget the reality at home,<sup>12</sup> something which never happened in the case of Sayyid Ahmad Khan.<sup>13</sup> However, on such occasions, when the storm of Shibli's emotions subsided, he would try to make amends for his thoughtlessness.<sup>14</sup> Consequently, we find in his writings and behaviour until the end of his life evidence both for insolent and subdued postures towards the government.<sup>15</sup> Shibli's protagonists and antagonists have gone to extremes on this subject. The former would have in Shibli's thinking a level of political self-confidence and anti-Britishness which was not really there,<sup>16</sup> and which was characteristic only of a later phase of Indian-British relations. This, of course, necessitated far-fetched explanations of Shibli's pro-government writings as well as of those amends which Shibli would make with the government for his emotional outbursts.<sup>17</sup> The antagonists, on the other hand, accuse Shibli of cowardice and sycophancy on the 12. Sayyid Sulaymān Nadwī, op. cit., p. 632.

13. This is an important point in order not only to understand the politics but also the respective characters of Shibli and Sayyid Ahmad Khan. Sayyid Ahmad Khan was a very cool-headed man, who never crossed the self-imposed limits. Shibli, on the other hand, was a very impulsive man, who hardly knew any rules. And yet, intrinsically, Sayyid Ahmad Khan was a braver man and a better person than Shibli—however much one may want to disagree with his politics.

14. Sayyid Sulayman Nadwī, op. cit., pp. 633 f.

15. Ibid., pp. 630-36.

16. Ibid., pp. 607 f.

17. Ibid., pp. 630-36.

basis of these writings.<sup>18</sup> These gentlemen tend to overlook the fact that it was unthinkable at that time, even for the Indian National Congress, to talk of disloyalty to the government. They should rather give credit to Shibli, perhaps not a very courageous man at bottom, for being able to denounce the almighty British as much as he did in some of the testiest verses of Urdu.<sup>19</sup>

(3)

As mentioned earlier, Shibli's interest and involvement in Muslim politics outside India—which to him was synonymous with the ups and downs in the fortunes of the Ottoman Sultanate—was based on his Islamic feelings. To him the Ottoman Sultanate was Islam personified, and the Sultan was its strength. This is evident from his report of Sultan 'Abd al-Hamid's state-drive in Constantinople which Shibli had visited in 1892. What is worth noticing in this description is the intensity of his feelings for the Sultan in whom he saw the political might of Islam.<sup>20</sup> Another example is his reaction to the news of the Ottoman Constitutional Revolution of 1908: "Muslims recalled the lesson of amruhum shurā now. . . . 'Abd al-Hamid atoned

18. Muhammed Amin Zubayri, op. cit., pp. 34-37, 63, 140 f.; Shaykh Muhammed Ikrām, Shibli Nāma, pp. 256 f.

19. Kulliyat, pp. 53-56, 59, 79, 82-85, 101-03.

20. Makārib, I, 15 f.; Safarnāma, pp. 112-17.

Intellectual Modernism of Shibli Nu'mani

for the sins of Mu'awiyah.”<sup>21</sup>

Shibli's attitude towards Ottoman Turkey was so romantic and emotionally based that he never tried or desired to know what was really happening inside the Empire. His view of the Armenian Question, mentioned before, is only one instance of it. Even the fact of the disintegration of the Empire could not bring the reality home: “Turkey nominally lost a few provinces. . . . These fragments will be regained after the rectification of internal conditions; the Young Turks know this point well.”<sup>22</sup> When ‘Atiyyah Begam Faydī visited Turkey a year after the Revolution and returned with the opinion that Turkey was a plaything of the Big Powers, and that the new loans had rendered it bankrupt, Shibli would not believe it despite the facts that he had faith in ‘Atiyyah's judgment in such matters, and that his trusted friend Mahdi Hasan also agreed with her.<sup>23</sup> How could anything possibly go wrong with this last bulwark of Islam?

With the Italian invasion of Tripoli in 1911 and the Balkan War in 1912, Shibli's inter-Islamic political thinking, or emotion, was further crystallised. In a stirring poem filled with despair and appositely entitled “Shahr Āshob-i Islām” (Wasteland of Islam) he identified the Turkish defeat, which must have been a rude shock to 21. Makāib, II, 218.

22. Ibid., II, 219.

23. Ibid., II, 220.

him, with the material and ideological decline of Islam. To him it looked like the beginning of the end. In a verse, he said: "Decline of Dawlat-i 'Uthmān is the decline of shar'-o millat." In his eyes all the intricacies of European-Turkish politics were part of a continuing Crusade which might end up with the Christian occupation of the holy city of Mecca. In another verse he says: "How much will you take the revenge for the Ayyūbid victory from us; how long will you show us the scene of the Crusade."<sup>24</sup>

(4)

As pointed out in the beginning, it was this inter-Islamic politics which eventually involved Shibli in the native Indian politics with an unprecedented intensity. Two verses which Shibli wrote on the notorious incident of the Mosque of Kānpūr (13 August 1913)—in which many Muslims

24. Kulliyāt, pp. 53 f. One can observe his feelings expressed in several other poems which Shibli wrote at the time. In "Sar Āghā Khān kā Turkon se Khiṭāb," written both in Urdu and Persian, Shibli ridiculed Āghā Khān for advising the Turks that if they left Europe and retreated into Asia, they would be safe from the attacks of European Powers. In "Khayr Maqdam-i Dāktar Anṣārī," recited on the return of the Indian medical mission from Turkey, Shibli praised the members of the mission for the service they had rendered to the Turkish warriors of faith out of their Islamic sentiment of brotherhood, and described the Turkish misery and Christian-European brutality. In "Turkon se Khiṭāb," Shibli congratulates the Turks on their victory at Adrianople. In "Hastī-i Muslim kī Rahā'ī," Shibli gives the lie to British claim of friendship with Muslims and disengagement in Turkish debacle (ibid., pp. 55-60).

Marfat.com

Liberal Politics

poraries in North-Western India Shibli alone had the distinction of showing independence of mind and maturity of thought concerning national politics.

Politics in India began, in a real sense, with the establishment of the Indian National Congress in 1885. And in a speech on 28 December 1887, Sayyid Ahmad Khan advised the Muslims against joining it. Evidence concerning Shibli's reaction to Sayyid Ahmad Khan's policy and his early attitude towards the Congress is contradictory.<sup>28</sup> This much, however, seems clear that if he conformed with it in the beginning, Shibli to the grace of God, is our own strength. The precedent of this presented by our compatriots [Hindus] is before our eyes" (Muhammad Amin Zubayrī, Tadhkirah-i Wiqār, p. 341).

28. Maftūn Ahmad says that he saw a letter which Mahdī Hasan, Shibli's younger brother, wrote to Shibli from Cambridge England, on 29 March 1888. It said: "I learnt from 'Abd al-Ra'ūf's letter that you are against that Congress which calls itself National Congress . . . perhaps this is the first time that we are in agreement. Most of the Indians in England are in favour of this Congress. The first to oppose it [here] is your younger brother, Mahdī" (Adīb, p. 61). This is the only direct evidence we have in favour of Shibli's agreement with Sayyid Ahmad Khan's Congress policy, at least in the beginning. There are several against it. In a letter of his, dated 23 December 1912, Shibli himself claims that "For sixteen years I was with Sir Sayyid but in matters political I always differed with him, liked the Congress and often had arguments with Sir Sayyid" (Ma'ārif, XIV, 394). Khwājah Ghulām al-Thaqalayn writes in a note on Shibli's death: "Since the days of his professorship at the College, Mawlānā Shibli had a great dislike for Sir Sayyid's political ideas" (Sayyid Sulaymān Nadwī, op. cit., p. 608). According to H.R.K. Sherwānī, one of the reasons of Shibli's disappointment with Aligarh was the difference in political opinions; Shibli had become a supporter of the new movement [Congress] (ibid., p. 798).

Intellectual Modernism of Shibli Nu'mānī

gradually moved away from Sayyid Ahmad Khān's position to a more and more pro-Congress stance. As early as 1892 we have an indication of his democratic leanings.<sup>29</sup> In 1895 he was publicly disowning Sayyid Ahmad's policy towards the Congress.<sup>30</sup> Sometime before March 1897, he perhaps wrote an article in Aligarh Institute Gazette under a pseudonym advising Muslim leaders to join the Congress.<sup>31</sup> By the turn of the century we find him subscribing to a pro-Congress newspaper.<sup>32</sup> It was not, however, before another decade in 1912 that Shibli's ideas on Indian politics found a powerful expression in "Musalmānon kī Politikal Karvat".<sup>33</sup>

If the maturity of his ideas in this article is indicative of sustained thinking over a period of time, the timing is also very significant. It is

29. Ibid., p. 160.

30. Maqālāt-i Yawm-i Shibli, p. 103.

31. Ibid. We could not find any such letter or article in the few issues of the Gazette available in the library of the Institute of Islamic Studies, McGill. There is, however, an article by Theodore Beck in answer to an 'Āzād', obviously a pseudonym, who had written an article in the M.A.O. College Magazine supporting the Congress. The issue containing the latter article is missing; but a few statements referred to by Beck are: Muslims gained nothing by keeping away from the Congress; on the contrary, they were harmed; the Congress will certainly succeed in its efforts one day or another; the Muslim leaders should join hands with the founders of the Congress; the way things are developing they will certainly result in the victory of representative government against personal rule; foreigners cannot understand the wishes and needs of a people better than the natives themselves. Muhammadan Anglo-Oriental College Magazine, V, 124, 128 f., 131.

32. Sayyid Sulaymān Nadwī, op. cit., p. 609.

33. Maqālāt, VIII, 148-84.

Liberal Politics

quite possible that Shibli had done his thinking on Indian Muslim politics in its own right and had drawn his conclusion in favour of Muslim participation in the Congress in a purely Indian context. Also, one cannot deny that had there been no extra-Indian Islamic relevance, he still might have reacted in the same way and written the article in consequence of the annulment of the partition of Bengal, which took place in 1911. But the indications are, as pointed out earlier, that Shibli definitely got a psychological push from what had recently happened, and had been happening for some time in the past, to Turkey with the connivance and even instigation of the British.<sup>34</sup>

(5)

“Musalmānon ki Politikal Karvat,” which Shibli aptly describes as the prose commentary on his political poems,<sup>35</sup> is perhaps one of the most trenchant historical documents of the beginning of modern Muslim political consciousness in North-

34 Cf. W.C. Smith, Modern Islam in India, pp. 233 f. The psychological significance of the Indian Muslim involvement in the pan-Islamic movement between 1870 and 1924 lay, according to Aziz Ahmad, “partly in relation to a feeling of insecurity in the midst of Hindu majority” (op. cit., p. 123). But it would seem that at least in Shibli’s case it was the other way round. It was the frustration on pan-Islamic front that had him running in search of security right in the midst of Hindu majority.

35. Makātib, I, 243.

Intellectual Modernism of Shibli Nu'mānī

Western India. It is not merely one of the early expressions of the discontent of North-Western Indian Muslims with the policy they had been faithfully pursuing vis a vis the British Government since the days of Sayyid Ahmad Khan. It is perhaps also—together with Wiqār al-Mulk's "Hindostān men Musalmānon kī Ā'indah Ḥālat"<sup>36</sup>—a pioneering document which helped in giving form to the political discontent of Indian Muslims and contributed in setting the trend and the tone of their future political behaviour.<sup>37</sup> Here its resemblance with Wiqār al-Mulk's article ends. While Wiqār al-Mulk still pursued the policy of Hindu-Muslim separatism,<sup>38</sup> Shibli boldly set forth the more progressive course of Hindu-Muslim political unity. It is deplorable that Shibli's article was almost never given its due historical importance, perhaps because of two factors: one, he became a victim of pro-Aligarh and pro-Pakistan belligerency; two, he was overshadowed by later, more loquacious Indian Muslim leaders like Muhammad 'Alī and Abū al-Kalām. For us the article is significant in that it throws light on still another aspect of the modern liberal content of Shibli's thought. It is in the context of his attempt to forcefully circumvent the communal 36. See above, ref. 27.

37. Tufayl Ahmad Manglorī, Musalmānon kā Roshan Mustaqbil, pp. 374-9. Sayyid Sulayman Nadwī, op. cit., pp. 621 f.

38. Muḥammad Amin Zubayrī, Tadhkirah-i Wiqār, pp. 341 ff.

tendencies among the Muslims and to make a strong case for joint Hindu-Muslim political action that Shibli's thinking about two important concepts or institutions of modern polity, democracy and nationalism, also comes into relief, though he never refers to them by their names. But in the first place Shibli is concerned about the deeply implanted Muslim loyalism towards the British in his part of the country. This loyalist attitude is tantamount to political inactivity and also leads to communalism. To be politically active is to act like and with the Hindus. Shibli is fully aware, even highly appreciative, of the fact that his Hindu compatriots were far ahead of Muslims in political consciousness, vision, initiative, struggle, boldness, sacrifice, dedicated leadership and, consequently, achievements. (The recent Reform Scheme, which laid the foundation of self-government, was the crowning proof of this fact.) What Muslims could not get by begging from the government—and they did not even ask for much—Hindus got that plus much more by pressuring the government.<sup>39</sup> Even the Muslims in other parts of the country did not remain unaffected by this struggle. (Instances are: Badr al-Dīn Tayyibji and Rahmat Allah Sayānī in Bombay, Sayyid Muhammad in Madras and Ameer Ali in Calcutta.)<sup>40</sup>

39. Maqālāt, VIII, 149-51, 154, 164, 166, 168-70.

40. Ibid., p. 154.

Intellectual Modernism of Shibli Nu'māni

"But it is a matter of great surprise that the [area comprising] western and northern provinces and Agra, Delhi and the Punjab—which had once been the centre of the government and the heart and brain of India, where Muslims had received more education as compared to other parts of India, and where the scions of the best families of the Arabs and the 'Ajams were present—remained so insensitive to the politics that even now it stammers in uttering the word 'politics'."<sup>41</sup>

According to Shibli, the reason for the political backwardness of Muslims of this area is that, through Sayyid Ahmad Khan, they were kept away from politics—from legitimate freedom and seeking their rights.<sup>42</sup>

"The thing which we took to be politics [Shibli says] was an insult to politics. Our politics whose voice fell into our ears, like Kalimah-i Shahādat, since the day of birth was only this: 'the time has not yet arrived; right now we should make ourselves fit for politics; only education is needed now; our numbers are small, therefore, representative government is not suitable for us'. These words were repeated so many times that they fused into the anatomy of the nation . . . when the word politics is mentioned in the midst of the general body of Muslims, one is astounded to see that the best educated young man repeats them like a gramophone."<sup>43</sup>

Consequently, Muslim political consciousness became absolutely dead. In contrast to the Hindus who made great sacrifices for national uplift, the 41. Ibid., pp. 154 f. See W. C. Smith, op. cit., pp. 195 ff., for an analysis of this situation.

42. Maqālāt, VIII, 155.

43. Ibid., VIII, 149-51.

Liberal Politics

Muslims made "B.A. and jobs" their ideal. This base motive turned the Muslim into a nation of timids and cowards. "Our politicial dictionary defined legitimate freedom as rebellion." A Parsee or Hindu joins the Congress, criticises the government and still remains the member of the Parliament and of the Viceroy's Council. But Muslims are afraid to participate in the Muhammadan Educational Conference, and Sayyid Ahmad Khān has to declare that it is not forbidden to participate in it. "We know that many an honoured gentleman made their membership of the Muslim League dependent upon the permission from Sāhib Kaliktār Bahādur."<sup>44</sup>

Muslims did not pay any attention to politics in the first place. But when they suddenly decided otherwise, they came up with the Muslim League. "What is this unusual creature? Is it politics? God forbid, no. Is it anti-Congress? No. Is it a House of Lords? Yes, the masquerade seems somewhat like that."<sup>45</sup> Shibli calls the Muslim League by various other names,<sup>46</sup> insinuates its government origin and insists that it "cannot become politics today or a thousand years after".<sup>47</sup>

Why is it that Shibli refuses to regard the kind of politics the Muslim League was engaged in as

44. Ibid., VIII, 150 f.

45. Ibid., VIII, 161.

46. "A spurious, useless thing," "mirage," "political Thespians," "children's play". Ibid., VIII, 163, 168, 171.

47. Ibid., VIII, 163 f.

Intellectual Modernism of Shibli Nu'māni

genuine? Because politics, according to Shibli, is born with the recognition of the principle that the British Government is a parliamentary (constitutional) government. This, Shibli says:

"means that the subjects have every kind of say in the administration, have the right to express opinion and to criticise. Indeed, it is more true to say that the subjects themselves are the ruled and the rulers; they make law for themselves and act upon it."

There is no confusion in this matter as far as England is concerned. But in India its course alters

"and that is the point from which the line of our, that is Indian, politics begins."<sup>48</sup>

What Shibli means is that self-government (under British protection) should be the aim of Indian politics. Until that aim is achieved, "politics is the name of the mutual demands of the government and the subjects, and not of the subjects' quarrels with, and demands from, each other."<sup>49</sup> In other words, Shibli would have Hindus and Muslims jointly struggle for greater participation in the government of India, rather than fight with each other.

In Shibli's searching analysis, the Muslim League falls ridiculously short of this standard. Shibli regards the Simla Deputation as the foundation-stone and the continuing spirit of the 48. Ibid., VIII, 152.

49. Ibid., VIII, 165.

Muslim League, calls it "the biggest play (tamāshā) staged on the national stage" and characterises its aim in these terms: out of those national rights which Hindus have achieved through their thirty years' struggle, a part should be earmarked for the Muslims. All that the Muslim League stands for is, in Shibli's view, that "Hindus are over-dominating us; therefore, we should protect ourselves". The rest is face-saving and local colour.<sup>50</sup> Shibli compares the respective demands of the Congress and the League, and shows the pettiness of the latter, and maintains that if the Congress' demands are met, it will change the destiny of India. He also criticises the League for inefficiency in its methods, incompetence of its representatives, want of seriousness of purpose, lack of selflessness and sacrifice and finally for its money-ed, landed or knighted and, therefore, interest-bound and slavish leadership. Shibli derides the Muslim League's financial dependence on a certain "generous hand" (meaning probably the Agha Khan) which controls its policies.<sup>51</sup>

Despite his utter disgust with its aims, methods and leaders, Shibli seems to accept the Muslim League as an accomplished fact of political life and would like to see it reformed and function, if it stands for Muslim political activism, like another political party in addition to the Congress. (The presence of liberal, conservative and

50. Ibid., VIII, 164.

51. Ibid., VIII, 165-71.

Intellectual Modernism of Shibli Nu'māni

radical schools or groups in the politics of England can serve as a model.)<sup>52</sup> He even makes certain suggestions for this purpose of which the following are very significant in order to understand the drift of his mind. The League should give up its communal stance and think in terms of India. For instance, it should press for Permanent Settlement. "Suppose," he says, "if, like Bengal, in our part of the country too Istimrāī Band-o Bast comes to be, will this be a blessing for India, or only that a few more Muslims get jobs?" The demand should be made for the participation of Indians in all administrative affairs. In short, except for any particular resolution, the Muslim League should include all the proposals of the Congress in its programme and should fight for them legally like the Hindu moderate group. Ameer Ali's recent proposal for a joint Hindu-Muslim stage for common problems should be adopted. The Muslim League executive committee should be rid of big land-owners.<sup>53</sup> (Shibli had very definite views on the question of political leadership. He elaborates upon them in a separate article entitled "Līdaron kā Quṣūr hay ya Līdar banāne wālon kā?"<sup>54</sup> To him the office of a leader is different from that of a benefactor and should be clearly distinguished. Thus the Āghā Khān is our benefactor for his very generous contributions to the Aligarh University. But the person needed for leadership is one "who is free, like Gokhale, from title, property, wealth and all other ties; is zealous, bold and, at the same time, an expert in politics and a long-time student of political literature". If such persons are not found in the nation, Shibli would rather keep the post vacant and wait.)<sup>55</sup>

52. Ibid., VIII, 158 f., 178.

53. Ibid., VIII, 171-73.

54. Ibid., VIII, 182 ff.

(6)

At one point Shibli went so far as to concede that the Congress, not necessarily exhaustive of the possibilities of political expression, "is not advantageous to us" and that "our needs, if common with, are also different from those of the Hindus and we therefore need a separate political stage".<sup>56</sup> But the Muslim League could not come up to his idea of that separate political stage, and, despite his promise to stop opposing it subject to its being reformed,<sup>57</sup> he remained sceptical about its role in Indian politics. The League continued to be anathema for him till the very last. The fact was that he never really accepted it in his heart. And this was not merely because it failed to correct itself radically enough for Shibli's

55. Ibid., VIII, 183 f.

56. Ibid., VIII, 158 f., 161. This concession on the part of Shibli appears to be more methodological than real. He is trying to talk the Muslims into taking up aggressive, demanding politics.

57. Ibid., VIII, 178.

Intellectual Modernism of Shibli Nu'mānī

liking (he would not be satisfied with anything short of a virtual Congressisation of the Muslim League) and on that score went on incurring his scathing criticism.<sup>58</sup> A further, more basic, reason for Shibli's almost total rejection of the League was that he could not stomach the very rationale offered for a separate political platform for the Muslims. He criticised Wiqār al-Mulk's aforementioned article in the following, revealing words:

"[It] could have been the voice of a truly courageous Muslim, had it not contained this incorrect logic that, if we join the National Congress, our existence will be destroyed in the same way in which small rivers vanish into the ocean. If the Parsees numbering only one hundred thousand can preserve their existence in the midst of one hundred and ninety million Hindus and fifty million Muslims, then fifty million Muslims should not be afraid that their existence will be destroyed."<sup>59</sup>

Shibli, who had no way of knowing that India would eventually be partitioned on communal basis, accepted it as a fact that "Muslims are a minority now and will remain a minority always,"<sup>60</sup> and still had the courage to believe that the Muslims can and should make a joint political platform with the Hindus. What he did not believe, or at least pretended not to believe, was, again, the rationale offered by a Muslim correspondent of the Pioneer that "since it is now

58. Kulliyāt, pp. 67-71, 104-06, 108.

59. Maqālāt, VIII, 149.

60. Ibid., VIII, 157.

Liberal Politics

obvious that because of the weakening of Turkey and Iran our foreign status will not be the same, therefore, we should join up with the Hindus."<sup>61</sup> Shibli, on the other hand, maintained that "it is good to join up with the Hindus; but, then, it was always good and will always be good. The new need which the correspondent had mentioned is a disgrace for Islam. Should we take refuge with neighbours because we do not have a support any longer? Could Turkey and Iran, were they strong, have helped us against our neighbours? Did the British believe in Simla Deputation's boast that our political weight is more than that of our neighbours?"<sup>62</sup>

Shibli puts the main blame for Hindu-Muslim disunity on Muslim shoulders—on the Muslims' quarrelsomeness, and their deliberate provocation of communal feelings for selfish ends.<sup>63</sup> Shibli became so self-critical here as to say that "it is obvious that the Hindus never marched against Iran and Arabia. It is we who invaded their country and destroyed their famous temple Somnath and others in Banaras and Mathrā." But for all that the Hindus have been in the past and still are very forgiving, generous and helpful to the Muslims.<sup>64</sup>

61. Ibid., VIII, 141; quoted by Shibli.

62. Ibid.

63. Ibid., VIII, 173 f.

64. Ibid., VIII, 174 ff. In his description of Hindu magnanimity and cooperation with Muslims, Shibli apparently became so one-sided that it hurt the Muslim feeling. He had to write a sort of postscript showing that the Hindus were not being friendly with the Muslims for nothing. What the Hindus did was in response to the nice and benevolent treatment of them by the Muslim conquerors once they had settled down in India. Ibid., VIII, 178-81.

In the light of the above it would not be difficult to comprehend that Shibli was deeply impressed by the aims and methods of the moderate group in the Congress led by Gokhale, and that he regarded parliamentary democracy as an ideal for India. He was, in short, a liberal and a democrat in Indian politics.<sup>65</sup> Shibli does not explain why it is good to establish common political bonds with the Hindus, religiously. Perhaps the question did not occur to him as such. And if it did, he perhaps refused to regard it a religious question. We do not find him concerned with this question in the manner of, say, Azād, Madanī, Iqbāl or Mawdūdī. Apparently the only authority that Shibli looked for, and managed to find, was in historical precedents of Indian (not even early, Arabian) Islam.<sup>66</sup> One may perhaps justifiably characterise his whole approach in this matter as a religious or secular. This is borne out by more positive evidence from none other than Shibli himself. According to his own statement, the Indian Muslims have two statuses: one, that they are the subjects of the British Government; two, that they are Muslims. Shibli insists that in politics the former has pre-

65. It is interesting to note that he also comes out strongly against anarchism and nihilism and would like to maintain the levels in society. Al-Kalām, p. 237. But as compared to Sayyid Ahmad Khān he has adjusted himself to the fact that persons of lowly origin may rise to high positions. Maqālāt, VIII, 158.

66. Maqālāt, VIII, 174-81.

Liberal Politics

cedence over the later.<sup>67</sup> Indeed, at one place he goes so far as to suggest by implication that religion and politics are no longer combined as they were in medieval times.<sup>68</sup> Although made as a statement of fact, its message is unmistakable, particularly if seen in conjunction with Shibli's concept of Islam as a religion, described elsewhere in this thesis.<sup>69</sup> After that it becomes easier to understand how he could afford to be so uninhibited a liberal in politics and why he was such an unconditional supporter of the Congress and the Hindu-Muslim unity. Shibli's conception of the goodness of Hindu-Muslim political alliance does not seem to be merely tactical or temporary either. It may have been contingent in its origin, but it appears to have taken on the quality of a conviction.

In Shibli's ideas on the subject of Hindu-Muslim unity and in his readiness to go to great lengths in this matter, we also find the early beginnings of the nationalist Islam or muttahiddah qawmiyyat (composite/united Indian nationalism) which was to be developed later into a full-fledged ideology by persons like Abū al-Kalām Azād and Husayn Ahmad Madanī, who at the same time turned it into a theological proposition, something which Shibli never did. To Shibli it seemed just the right or the most obvious thing to do. He was

67. Ibid., VIII, 151 f.

69. See above, p. 76.

68. Ibid., VIII, 179.

Intellectual Modernism of Shibli Nu'mānī

a nationalist and he was a Muslim. But it is difficult to say what kind of nationalist Muslim he was. He is hard to categorise in terms of the various types of nationalist Muslims mentioned by Smith.<sup>70</sup> But if one has to squeeze him into one of them, then one should say that Shibli is nearer in his nationalism, as in his democratic liberalism, to that brand of pro-Congress Muslim leaders a typical representative of which was Badr al-Dīn Tayyibjī of Bombay. Indeed, one may usefully recall here that Shibli, in the post-Aligarh phase of his life, was almost a regular visitor to Bombay, in fact to the very house (of 'Atīyyah Begam Faydī) to which Tayyibjī was closely related by blood and in ideas.<sup>71</sup> One may, therefore, reasonably infer that Shibli was influenced in his nationalist thinking by the progressive Muslim school of politics of Bombay, a counterpart of the Madras and Calcutta schools.

Finally, it should also be pointed out that Shibli's nationalism was typically without bark or bite. His was not what Smith would call "negative" nationalism.<sup>72</sup> He did not share the views of the extremist group of the Congress led by Tilak. He had no intention to oust the British from India and win swarāj or azādī. One wonders if he ever visualised such a possibility. All he wanted was to contain the British constitutionally with the fullest possible cooperation of the Hindu compatriots and also reap the fruits together with them. Perhaps this was his way of getting even with the British!

70. W. C. Smith, op. cit., pp. 251 ff.

71. Adīb, p. 305; Shaykh Muḥammad Ikrām, op. cit., p. 220.

72. W.C. Smith, Islam in Modern History, pp. 79 ff.

Thus, Shibli may be a romantic when it came to extra-Indian Islam or Islamic past, but he was a realist in contemporary Indian politics; or was he really, now that the British are out and the children of Mother India are divided into two political units?

Conclusion

---

In conclusion, it appears that Shibli was willing to sacrifice, as far as it was feasible, the traditional form of Islam for the modern fact of Islam. Herein he is hardly distinguishable from Sayyid Ahmad Khan. Both were in favour of change in the religion which they had inherited from the past. Both were basically responding to the challenges of Europe's scientific outlook. Both cherished the desire to preserve Islam in some form or the other. The difference arises in respect of the nature or extent of the change they were ready to accept in their faith, or, in other words, with regard to their respective conclusions about Islam as a religion. Sayyid Ahmad Khan would reduce Islam to a form of deism or natural religion, the essence of which is "truth rather than faith" and "Truth, in so far as it is cognizable by human reason, is identified with nature and its laws." Sayyid Ahmad's thesis, if accepted, would not only have compromised the individuality and specificity of the Islamic faith, but would also have robbed it of its vitality, rendering it static, cold and bloodless, and converting it almost into a mechanical formula. Eventually, it would have killed Islam as a living, vibrating, emotionally-satisfying faith. Sayyid Aḥmad Khān's Islam was too negative to be held in heart. In his attempt to save Islam from annihilation by divesting it of its unnatural and unscientific elements, perhaps unknowingly, Sayyid Aḥmad Khān had deprived it also of its human and divine elements. Perhaps that partly explains why Sayyid Aḥmad Khān's conception of Islam could not gain sympathy and success. On the other hand, Shibli's conception of Islam became "popular," even if only relatively. This is borne out by the casual fact that the Library of the University of Karachi holds twelve copies of Al Kalām, pretty worn out from frequent use, while Sayyid Aḥmad Khān's tafsīr or his theological articles, far from being consulted, have not even been duplicated.

Conclusion

Shibli's Islam was comparatively a thing of flesh and blood, a living organism. It seemed at once human and—or rather therefore—theopneustic. The fact that in the end Shibli inclined towards Rūmī's concept of wahdat al-wujūd merely shows that Shibli was not a systematic thinker. It did not go with the main thrust of his theological thinking. Shibli wanted to keep intact the idea of revelation from a living, active and personal God to an essentially responsible and actively responding mankind. He endorsed the universal quality of revelation, but at the same time believed in special revelation to Prophets in general and the Prophet of Islam in particular. He saw to it that the mode and message of revelation conformed to nature, science and, above all, to reason, but he would not have it circumscribed, determined or created at least by science or nature. To him Islam was a self-necessitating and self-justifying process of faith and action, even if not a self-explaining and self-relating one. This is what makes him an Islamic modernist in the truer and more profound sense of the word. He would change the face but not the faith of Islam as something spiritual and moral in its essence. This is all the more evident from his attitude towards law and politics.

Intellectual Modernism of Shibli Nu'mani

While it would not be fair to suggest that Shibli was deliberately whittling away what he held to be the sacred law of Islam or to suspect his religious and intellectual integrity, it should be admitted that he was in favour of fairly radical changes in the medieval law of Islam through a major reshuffle and redefinition of the traditional bases of Islamic law-making. This would certainly result in altering the conventional picture of the shari'ah and, perhaps more significantly, would also render it resilient enough to absorb the subsequent shocks of socio-historical upheavals. Indeed, the results were so sweeping that they would have surprised Shibli if he had pursued them to their logical end. For this reason, or due to lack of systematic thinking, Shibli makes no attempt to spell out the full implications of his legal ideas, or to present a coherent picture of the shari'ah for modern times. Or was it because Shibli realised that being too logical, explicit or comprehensive in the matters of a divine-cum-human shari'ah would prove to be self-defeating, and inhibit that freedom of interaction between the human and the divine in history which was, or should be, the hall-mark of an ever-evolving shari'ah? Be that as it may, the fact remains that Shibli was in favour, not only of changing the positive contents of Islamic law, but also of releasing its potential for further changes.

Conclusion

The same liberal spirit is manifest in Shibli's approach to politics, which is even more radical than his approach to law. Indeed, at a superficial glance he seems to be almost indifferent to religious considerations in politics. This view is particularly strengthened by the fact that Shibli chose to be secular and nationalist in politics. But, in our opinion, this should not be understood to mean that Shibli took his Islam rather lightly. On the contrary, we believe that his decision to become areligious in politics was a serious religious decision, which would have been made impossible without his specific view of Islam as essentially comprising beliefs, rituals and morals. While it would not be true to assert that Shibli deduced his nationalistic ardour from any positive interpretation of Islam as recommending loyalty to, and concern for, a society transcending the bounds of Islam, it would be equally untrue to hold that Shibli was a nationalist in spite of being a Muslim. He did work out, even if implicitly, a relation between the two facts. Only he reached the conclusion that the two facts were unrelated, or should be kept unrelated, to one another in the modern, multi-communal polity of India. Shibli's conception of Islam was no hindrance to this. Indeed, it may even have been a positive source of inspiration. This would not preclude him from conceiving Islam and politics in a closer relationship in different situation, time and place.

Intellectual Modernism of Shibli Nu'mānī

When all was said and done, Islam still remained the primary concern and final frame of reference for Shibli. It will be great injustice to him to think that he had gone overboard or changed his loyalties. He was a true forerunner of the breed of Islamic modernists typified by Fazlur Rahman whose Islam comes in the direct line of Shibli's religious writings.

THE END

Appendix

---

A Chronological Bio-Bibliography of Shibli

1857-1863

Muhammad Shibli born to an upper middle-class, land-owning, Rājpūt family of Azamgarh, U.P. In addition to being a zamindār, Shibli's father was also a tājir and a wakil. Shibli was reported a precocious child.

1863-1876

Formal education began at the age of six. Learnt Qur'ān and Persian. Later studied Persian poetry and ma'qūlāt under Mawlānā Fārūq Chāriyākotī, Islamic jurisprudence under Mawlānā Irshād Ḥusayn Rāmpūrī (both ghālī Hanafites; Shibli's nisbah, Nu'mānī, result of this influence) and Arabic literature under Mawlānā Fayd al-Ḥasan, Professor in Oriental College, Lahore, taking especial interest in pre-Islamic Arabic poetry and memorising Hamāsah. Wrote Zill al-Ghamām fī Mas'alaat al-Qir'at Khalf al-Imām (1875). Performed Hajj.

1876-1883

Shibli's father made him study law; could pass the examination only in the second attempt. Tried his hand at practising law and a couple of official jobs in the local court of law, but failed to make a career out of them. For a while looked after his father's landed and business interests; but most of the time busy in general reading, poetry composition and disputing with the ghayr muqal-

Intellectual Modernism of Shibli Nu'mānī

Idīn. Wrote Iskāt al-Mu'tadī 'alā Insāt al-Muqtadī (1881).

1883-1898

Appointed Professor of Persian at the M.A.O College, Aligarh. Stayed close to Sayyid Ahmad Khān and his library. Wrote two long poems: "Qaṣidah-i 'Idīyyah" (1883) and "Mathnawī Ṣubḥ-i Ummīd" (1884) to rouse the Indian Muslims and rally them round the Aligarh movement. Founded a modern type school for education in his native town and named it National School. Wrote his first research article "Musalmānon kī Guzashtah Ta'līm" (1886) and Al-Ma'mūn (1887). Wrote several historical articles such as "Jizyah," "Huqūq al-Dhimmīyīn," "Islāmī Kutubkhāne," "Kutubkhānah-i Iskandarīyah," etc., for the Aligarh College Magazine (1887-1892). Wrote Sīrat al-Nu'mān (1889-1890). Travelled to Turkey, Syria and Egypt for educational purposes and to search material for his books, especially Al-Fārūq; visited educational institutions, libraries, museums, teachers and scholars including 'Abduh; studied the syllabi of the modern and traditional educational institutions, which proved useful when he had to prepare the syllabi for certain educational institutions in his own country; was awarded Tamghah-i Majīdī by the Turkish Government. Upon his return, wrote Sarfarnāmah-i Rūm-o Misr-o Shām (1893). Government of India awarded the title of Shams al-'Ulamā'. Was appointed Fellow of Allahabad University and Member of its Faculty of Arts and Board of Studies. Wrote Al-Fārūq (1894-1898). Through Aligarh, he came to know many a distinguished people of his time (such as Muhsin al-Mulk, Ḥālī, Nadhīr Ahmad, 'Abd al-Razzāq Kānpūrī and the Bilgirāmī Brothers, Sayyid 'Alī and Sayyid Ḥusayn) and became generally well known himself. Perhaps next to Sayyid Ahmad Khān, he was on closest friendly terms with T.W. Arnold, Professor of Philosophy at Aligarh College; very frequently they met, exchanged ideas and their respective knowledge of Arabic and French. Muḥammad 'Alī and Zafar 'Alī Khān were two of his more prominent students who, by their own admission, were deeply influenced by him. Started taking increasing interest in Nadwat al-'Ulamā'. Resigned from Aligarh College after Sayyid Ahmad Khan's death. Reasons for resignation became subject of a big controversy.

Appendix

1898-1901

Multifarious activities and intermittent spells of illness. Looked after the earlier founded National School in Azamgarh; and put together his personal library there. Visited various places such as Allahabad, Lucknow, Kashmir, etc. Intended to attend the Orientalists' conference at Rome in 1899. Also wanted to go to Iran. Family troubles after the second marriage and father's death who bequeathed considerable financial obligations. Declined Arnold's invitation to come to Lahore, and went to Hyderabad instead.

1901-1905

Appointed Nāzim of Sar Rishtah-i 'Ulūm-o Funūn in Hyderabad State. Participated in various literary meetings; and associated with Dāgh, Sharar, the Bilgirāmī Brothers and other literary figures. Wrote Al-Ghazā'i and 'Ilm al-Kalām (1902), Al-Kalām and Mawāzīn-i Anis-o Dabīr (1903), and Sawāniḥ Mawlawī Rūm (1904). Resigned from his job and left Hyderabad apparently due to local politics. Earlier, declined Muhsin al-Mulk's offer to rejoin the Aligarh College.

1905-1913

Became Secretary of the Dār al-'Ulūm, Nadwat al-'Ulamā', Lucknow, and launched it on its new, more

Intellectual Modernism of Shibli Nu'mānī

vigorous career ; and himself embarked upon the most hectic and many-sided career of his life, at once educational, romantic and political. Expanded the membership and patronage of the Nadwah, raised funds and had the permanent building of the Dār al-‘Ulūm constructed; effected important changes in the syllabus, method of education and the teaching personnel; took a select few of his students (such as Sayyid Sulaymān, ‘Abd al-Salām and, for a short while, Abū al-Kalām) under his wing and groomed them for scholarship; held an educational fair under the auspices of Nadwah at Banāras; invited dignitaries like the Āghā Khān and Rāshīd Ridā' as chief guests to annual convocations. Al-Nadwah, the official organ of Nadwat al-‘Ulamā', placed under Shibli's editorship since 1904, now became the chief vehicle of his research and review articles, which constitute the major portion of the eight volumes of his Maqālāt. At Muḥammad ‘Alī's request wrote a series of articles on Awrangzeb (1906-1908). Wrote Shi'r al-'Ajam in five volumes (1908-1912), winning a prize for it from the University of the Panjab as the best book of the year. Was persuaded by Muḥammad ‘Alī to write a rebuttal to Margoliouth's work on the Prophet; started work on it in 1912. In a visit to Bombay met the Faydī Sisters and cultivated an enduring relationship especially with ‘Atīyyah Begam; after losing a leg in an accident, visits to Bombay became frequent for the purpose of treatment, change of climate and also to see ‘Atīyyah Begam; composed a series of love-poems collected under the titles Dastah-i Gul (1905-1907), and Bū'e Gul (1908); wrote interesting letters to ‘Atīyyah Begam (1906-1909) compiled in Khutūt-i Shibli. Also composed a great many Islamic and political poems (1911-1913) included in Kulliyāt; wrote his famous article “Musalmānon kī Politikal Karwat” (1912). Despite his earnest desire to work in and through 'ulamā', Shibli could not win them to his point of view and the Nadwah became a hotbed of controversies; on the question of the syllabus for the Dār al-'Ulūm and certain articles in Al-Nadwah, especially "Mas'alah-i Irtiqā' awr Darwin," was opposed by the mawlawīs; was condemned for his liberal ways; and branded kāfir on the basis of certain passages of Al-Kalām. Resigned.

Appendix

1913-1914

Returned to Azamgarh and founded Dār al-Muṣannifīn, dedicating his house and his library to it; engaged himself in writing Sirat al-Nabī, and training specialists in various branches of Islamic learning. Died and was buried in Azamgarh.

Bibliography

---

Ahmad, Aziz, Islamic Modernism in India and Pakistan, 1857-1964, Oxford, 1967

Amīn, Qāsim Bak, Musalmān 'Awrat kī Āzādī, Tr. Muham-mad Sarwar, Lahore, 1948

Beck, Theodore, "The Congress and the Muhammadans," M.A.O. College Magazine, March 1897, pp. 124-33

Hāli, Altāf Ḥusayn, Maqālāt-i Hāli, Vol. II, Delhi, 1943

Ḥasan, M. Mahdī, Ifādāt-i Mahdī, Ed. Mahdī Begam, Lahore, 1949

Ibn Farīd, Ed., Adīb, "Shiblī Nambar," Agra, 1960

Ikrām, Shaykh Muham-mad, Shiblī Nāmah, Lucknow, n.d.

Khān, Khān 'Ubayd Allāh, Ed. Maqālāt-i Yawm-i Shiblī, Lahore, 1961

Khān, Sayyid Ahmād, Ākhīrī Maḍāmīn, Lahore, 1898

—, Maqālāt-i Sar Sayyid, Vol. V, Lahore, 1962

—, Mukammal Majmū'ah-i Laykcharz-o Ispīchiz, 1863-1898, Ed. Inām al-Dīn Gujrātī, Lahore, 1900

—, Al-Tahrīr fī Uṣūl al-Tafsīr, Agra, 1892

Mahdī, Muham-mad, Tadhkirah Shams al-'Ulamā' Mawlānāt Shiblī Marhūm, Bombay, 1925

Manglorī, Ṭufayl Ahmād, Musalmānōn kā Roshan Mustaqbil, Delhi

Muham-mad, Mi'rāj, "Shāh Wali Allāh's Attempt to Reconcile the Schools of Fiqh," Unpublished M.A. Thesis, McGill University, Montreal, 1968

Nadwī, Sayyid Sulaymān, Hayāt-i Shiblī, Azamgarh, 1943

Rahman, Fazlur, Islam, London, 1966

Bibliography

Rahman, Fazlur, "Revival and Reform in Islam," The Cambridge History of Islam, Vol. II, Ed. P.M. Holt, et al., Cambridge, 1970, pp. 632-56

Rizvi, S.A.A., "The Breakdown of Traditional Society," The Cambridge History of Islam, Vol. II, Ed. P.M. Holt, et al., Cambridge, 1970, pp. 97-119

Safran, Nadav, Egypt in Search of Political Community, Cambridge, Massachusetts, 1961

Shiblī Nu'mānī, Bāqiyāt-i Shiblī, Lahore, 1965

—, Al-Ghazālī, Lahore, 1952

—, 'Ilm al-Kalām, Agra, n.d.

—, Al-Kalām, Cawnpore, 1313 H.

—, Khuṭūt-i Shiblī, Ed. Muḥammad Amin Zubayrī, Agra, n.d.

—, Kulliyāt-i Shiblī (Urdu), Azamgarh, 1954

—, Makātib, 2 vols., Ed. Sayyid Sulaymān Nadwī, Azamgarh, 1927-28

—, Maqālāt-i Shiblī, Vol. I (Religious), Azamgarh, 1954

—, Maqālāt-i Shiblī, Vol. IV (Critical), Azamgarh, 1934

—, Maqālāt-i Shiblī, Vol. V, Part I (Historical), Azamgarh, 1936

—, Maqālāt-i Shiblī, Vol. VII (Philosophical), Azamgarh, 1938

—, Maqālāt-i Shiblī, Vol. VIII (Miscellaneous), Azamgarh, 1938

—, Safarnāmah-i Rūm-o Misr-o Shām, Azamgarh, 1940

—, Sawānih Mawlawī Rūm, Lahore, 1909

Smith, Wilfred Cantwell, "Islam Confronted by Western Secularism: Revolutionary Reaction," Islam in the Modern World, Ed. Dorothea Seelye Franck, Washington, D.C., 1951, pp. 19-30

Intellectual Modernism of Shibli Nu'mānī

Smith, Wilfred Cantwell, Islam in Modern History, Princeton, 1957

—, Modern Islam in India, Lahore, 1969

Zubayrī, Muḥammad Amīn, Dhikr-i Shibli, Lahore, 1953

Index

‘Abd al-‘Azīz, Shāh, 87
‘Abd al-Ḥamīd, Sultān, 91, 95
‘Abd al-Ra‘ūf, 99 n.
Abū al-Ḥasan al-Ash‘arī, see Ash‘arī
Abū al-Hudhayl, 24 n.
Abū al-Kalām Āzād, see Āzād
Abū Bakr, 68
Abū Bakr Aṣamm, 40
Abū Ḥanīfah, 58 66, 68, 69
Abū Muslim Iṣfahānī, 30, 40
Abū Yūsuf, 62
‘ādah, 39 76
Adīb, 99 n., 114 n.
Adrianople, 97 n.
Afghānī, Jamāl al-Dīn, 89
Āghā Khān, 107, 108
Agra, 104
ahādīth, 64, 66-69; see also Hadīth ahl al-sunnah, 30
ahl-i ḥadīth, 57-59
ahl-i naṣar, 21
Ahmad Khān, Sayyid, 1-4, 11-13, 19, 34, 35, 39, 41-43, 45, 52, 86, 91, 92 n., 93, 94, 97, 100, 102, 104, 105, 112 n., 116, 117
a’imma, 60, 68
‘Ajams, 104
akhbār-i ahād, 65-66
Akhīrī Maḍārin, 91 n.
‘Alam-i amthāl, 49
‘Alam-i ashbāh, 49
‘Alam-i mithāl, 49
Alexander, 92
Aligarh, 99 n., 102, 114
Aligarh Institute Gazette, 98 n., 100, 109
Ameer Ali, 79, 80, 103, 108
‘āmī ‘ādat-i jārīyah, 38
āmīn bi al-jahr, 59 n.
angelology, 46, 52
Angels, 24, 53
‘aql, 29;—qaṭ’i, 65
Arabia, 73, 80, 83, 111
Arabs, 71, 104
arbāb-i ma’qūlāt, 29
arbāb-i zāhir, 21
Aristotle, 16
Armenia, 93
Armenian Question, 93, 96
Ashā’irah-i Zāhiriyīn, 20
Ash‘arī, Abū al-Ḥasan, 20, 59 n.
Ash‘arism, 19, 26-28, 51
Ash‘arites, 19-21, 23, 25, 28, 29, 32, 38-41, 47, 51, 52, 55, 59 n.
Asia, 97 n.
Asians, 84
asrār-o masālib, 65
‘Aṭīyyah Begam Faydī, 84, 85, 86 n., 96, 113
awwaliyat-i ‘Umar, 68
Ayyubids, 97
Āzād, Abū al-Kalām, 82 n., 102 n., 112, 113
dziddī, 114
Aziz Ahmad (Islamic Modernism), 4 n., 19 n., 43 n., 46 n., 51, 52, 73 n., 91 n., 101 n.
badāhah, 55

Intellectual Modernism of Shibli Nu'mānī

Badr al-Dīn Ṭayyibī, 103, 114
 Balkan, 98
 Balkan War, 87, 96
 Banāras, 111
 Banī Ismā'īl, 71
 Banī Isrā'īl, 71
Bāqiyāt, 78 n.
 Beck, Theodore, 100 n.
 Begam of Bhopal, 81
 Begam of Janjirah, 85
 Bengal, 98 n., 101, 108
 Bentham, 60
 Bombay, 103, 114
 Britain, 91
burqa', 80

 Calcutta, 103, 114
 Caliphate, 80, 91, 92; see also Khilāfat
 Caliphs, 68, 69, 80; Pious, 68, 69
 Cambridge, 77 n., 99 n.
Cambridge History of Islam, 2 n., 4 n., 82 n.
 Carlyle, 33
 Christianity, 17
 Companions (of the Prophet), 65, 69
 Constantinople, 93, 95

al-dalīl al-sharī', 75
dār al-amn, 87
Dar al-'Ulūm, 85, 92 n.
 Darius, 92
 Darwin, 9, 51, 53
 Dawlat-i 'Uthmān, 97
 Delhi, 104
al-Dbahabī, 22, 30
Dhikr-i Shibli, 93 n.
dhū ishārah, 48
dhū jihah, 48
dirāyat, 65

diyānah ṭabi'ah (natural religion), 13

 Edward, Milane, 36
 Egypt, 83
 Egyptians 93
 England, 99 n., 106, 108; see also Britain
 Europe, 5-7, 61, 88, 97 n., 116
 Europeans, 9, 84

faqīhs, 44, 59 n.
al-Fārābī, 24, 36, 50
farā'id awr arkān, 75
Farīd Wajdī, 13, 82
Fāris, 89
Fatūwā-i 'Alamgīrī, 62
 Fazlur Rahman (Islam), 1 n., 4 n., 35 n., 77 n., 120
fiqh, 44, 58, 59 n., 60, 61, 73 n., 92
fiqh-i jadidah, 39
fitnāh, 64
 Franck, Dorothea Seelye, 77 n.
 free-will, 16 n., 55

Ghaylān, 21
ghayr muqallidin, 57, 58
al-Ghazālī, 16, 17 n., 20, 23, 24, 26-28, 31, 32, 40, 42, 45, 47, 49, 59, 82 n.
Al-Ghazālī (Shibli), 4, 12 n., 15 n., 52 n.
Ghulām al-Thaqalayn, Khwājah, 99 n.
 Gibbon, Edward, 45
 Gokhale, 109, 112
 Greeks, 17, 24

Hadīth, 63-67, 69 n., 76, 92; ahād, 66; ma'an'an, 66; marfū', 66; mashhūr, 66; mutawātīr, 66

Index

Halakū, 92
Hālī, 58 n.
Hanafīm, 57-63, 68, 73, 74, 78
Hanafites, 22, 57-63, 68, 73, 74, 78
Hasbalites, 48
 "Hasti-i Muslim kī Rāhā'ī," 97 n.
Hayāt (Sayyid Sulaymān Nadwī),
 8 n., 37 n., 57 n., 89 n.
Hell, 55
Hereafter, 15, 21, 31, 45, 71
Hidāyah, 62
Hijāz, 89
Hindostan, 98 n.; see also India
Hindus, 99 n., 101 n., 102-11, 113, 115
Hishām b. al-Ḥakam, 24 n.
hudūd, 72
Hujjat Allāh al-Bālighah (Shāh Walī Allāh), 32, 70
ḥukamā', 28, 35, 47
ḥukamā'-i Islām, 23, 29
Husayn Aḥmad Madanī, 112, 113

i'ādah-l ma'dūm, 48
Ibn al-‘Ābidīn Shāmī, 74-76
Ibn Ḥajar, 22, 30
Ibn Ḥazm, 42
Ibn Miskawayh, 24, 28
Ibn Rushd, 17, 23, 24, 31, 36, 40-42
Ibn Sīnā, 24, 28, 35, 38, 40, 50
Ibn Taymīyyah, 24, 31
 'Id, 68
 'Id al-Adḥā, 87
idh'ān, 51
īhilmālāt, 21
ijtihād, 75
Ikhwān al-Ṣafā', 24
Ikrām, Shaykh Muḥammad,
 58 n., 79 n., 82 n., 95 n., 114 n.
īlhām, 43

 'illat-i khafīyyah, 65
 'ilm al-kalām, 1, 59 n.
'Ilm al-Kalām (Shiblī), 4, 16 n., 17 n., 18 n., 20 n., 21 n., 28 n.,
 29 n., 31 n., 50 n., 52 n.
'ilm-i kalam, 14, 15, 24-26
India, 1, 87, 91, 95, 99, 104, 106, 108, 110-12, 114; North-Western, 99, 101-02; see also Hindostan
Indian National Congress, 95,
 99-101, 105, 107, 110, 112-14
Inquisition, 6
Institute of Islamic Studies, 109 n.
Iqbal, 78 n., 112
Iran, 11
 'Irāq, 89
irtifāqāt, 72
İsfahānī, see Abū Muslim
*İskāt al-Mu'tadi 'alā Inṣāt al-
 Muatadi*, 57
Islam, 1-3, 6, 7, 10, 12, 13, 15, 18, 21, 23, 33, 34, 39, 45, 48, 50, 52,
 58, 69, 73, 76, 77, 79, 80, 83, 84,
 86-89, 92, 95, 96, 112-13, 115-20
Islamic Modernism (Aziz Ahmad), 91 n.
Islam in Modern History (W.C.
 Smith), 77 n.
Islam in the Modern World (D.S.
 Franck), 77 n.
Istimrārī Band-o Bast, 103
ittisāl, 66

 Jahm, 21
jamād, 54
 Jamāl al-Dīn Afghānī, see
 Afghānī
Jawāhir al-Qur'ān (al-Ghazālī), 27
 Jesus, 71
 Jews, 71
 Judaism, 17

Intellectual Modernism of Shibli Nu'mani

Kalām, 8, 4, 12-19, 22, 29, 31, 34, 50-52, 55, 59 n., 77
Al-Kalām (Shibli), 4, 7, 9 n., 10 n., 13 n., 14 n., 16 n., 21 n., 27 n., 30, 33 n., 35 n., 36 n., 37 n., 38 n., 44 n., 45 n., 46 n., 50, 52 n., 59 n., 70, 76 n., 77 n., 112 n., 117
Kalimah-i Shahādat, 104
Kānpur, 98; mosque of, 97
Karachi University, 117
kharq-i 'ādah, 39-41
khawāriq-i 'ādat, 40
 "Khayr Maqdam-i Daktar Anṣārī," 97 n.
Khilāfat, 91; see also Caliphate
khula, 61
Khuṭūṭ, 84 n., 86 n.
Khuṭbāt, 77 n.
kuṣr, 25, 48
Kulliyāt, 76, 89 n., 90, 95 n., 97 n., 100 n.
 "Līdaron ka Qaṣūr hay ya Līdar banāne walon ka?", 108
Ma'ārif, 99 n.
Ma'ārij al-Quds, 27, 30
Ma'bad, 21
Madanī, see Husayn Ahmad Madanī
Maḍnūn Ṣaghīr wa Kabīr (al-Ghazālī), 27
Madras, 103, 113
Maṣṭūn Aḥmad, 99 n.
Mahdī Ḥasan, 82 n., 96, 99 n.
Makatīb, 16 n., 82 n., 86 n., 87 n., 90 n., 95 n., 96 n., 101 n.
malāḥidah, 15, 18, 35
al-Ma'mūn, 22
manqūl, 27, 30
M.A.O. College Magazine, 100 n.
Maqālāt, 8 n., 74 n., 79 n., 80 n., 81 n., 82 n., 83 n., 84 n., 86 n., 87 n., 92 n., 93 n., 100 n., 103 n., 104, 110 n., 112 n.
Maqālāt-i Ḥāfi, 58 n.
Maqālat-i Sir Sayyid, 88 n.
Maqālāt-i Yawm-i Shibli, 100 n.
maqṣūd bi al-dhāt, 72
ma'qūl, 27, 30
al-Mar'at al-Jadīdah, 82
al-Mar'at al-Muṣlimah, 82 marriage, institution of, 60, 61
masā'il fiqhīyyah, 74, 75
 "Masā'il-i Fiqhīyyah par Zamāne kī Dīrūraton kā .thar," 73-74
Maṭālib-i 'Alīyah, 30 materialism, 54
Mathnawī, 50, 51
Mathra, 111
 Maturidism, 26 n.
 Maturidites, 47
Mawdūdī, 77 n., 112
mawlawīyyat, 82 n.
 Mecca, 97
 mesmerism, 40
 miracles, 24, 40, 41
mi'rāj, 49
 Mi'rāj Muḥammad, 73 n.
Mishkāt al-Anwār (al-Ghazālī), 27
 Mongols, 20, 80
 Moses, 71
mu'āmalāt, 60, 76
Mu'awiyah, 96
mugħħalaṭah, 5
muħaddithin, 22
muħāl, 47
 Muhammad, 46, 70; see also Prophet
Muhammad 'Alī, 102
Muhammad Amīn Zubayrī, 93, 95 n.
Muhammad Mahdī, 58 n.

Index

Muhammad, Sayyid, 103
Muhammadan Educational Conference, 105
muhaqqiqin, 42
Mukammal Majmū'ah-i Laykharz (Sayyid Ahmad Khan), 86 n.
Muller, Max, 35
munāfa', 87
Munqidh Min al-Dalāl (al-Ghazālī), 27
Musalmān 'Awrat ki Āzādī, 83 n.
 "Musalmānon kī Ā'indah Hālat," 98 n.
Musalmānon kī Politikal Karwat, 100, 101
 "Musalmānon ko Ghayr Madhhab Hukumat kā Maḥkūm ho kar Kiyūnkar Rahnā Chāhiye," 92
Muslim League, 105, 107-10
Muslims, 2, 8, 11, 17, 39, 40, 46, 48, 61, 62, 91-93, 95, 97, 100 n., 102-05, 107
muta'akhkhīrīn, 62
mutakallimīn, 17, 54; qudamā'-ī, 24
mutashābihāt, 47
Mu'tazilism, 19, 26, 28, 30
Mu'tazilites, 20-23, 25, 38, 30, 33, 36, 47, 50, 59 n., 67
muttaḥidah qawmiyyat, 113

nabāt, 54
Al-Nadwah, 86
Nadwat al-'Ulamā', 85, 92 n.
nafs, 49
Najd, 89
Nashr al-'Urf fi Blā' Ba'd al-'Aḥkām 'alā al-'Urf, 74
Nazārāt, 24 n.
Newton, 35
Nineteenth Century, 79
Nizām al-Mulk al-Tūsī, see al-Tūsī

Al-Nu'mān, 58 n., 59 n., 64 n.
nusūs-i Qur'āni, 55, 73, 75, 76
nusūs sharīyyah, 28

 Ottoman Caliphate, 92
 Ottoman Constitutional Revolution, 1908, 95
 Ottoman Empire, 90, 96
 Ottoman Sultanate, 95
 Ottomans, 91-93, 96

 Pakistan, 102
 pan-Islamism, 89
pardah, 79-84, 87
Pardah Awr Islām, 79
 Paris, 86 n.
 Parsees, 105, 110
 Permanent Settlement, 108
Pioneer, 110
 Plato, 16
 poll-tax, 68
 Porte, 93
 predestination, 16 n., 55
 Prophecy, 15, 21, 24, 31, 38, 41-46, 54
 Prophet (of Islam), 44, 45, 64, 67-69, 98; see also Muhammad Prophets, 6, 43, 49, 70, 71, 117
 Punjab, 104

 Qadarites, 22
 Qaffāl, 40
 Qāsim Amin, 81-83
qāfi al-dalālah, 40
 Qayrawān, 89
qiyāsāt awr zanniyāt, 5
qiyās-i shumūli, 51
qiyās-i tamthili, 51
qudrat, 40
 Qur'ān, 3, 13, 15, 18 n., 33, 36, 37, 39, 40, 44, 46, 59, 63, 66, 73, 92

Intellectual Modernism of Shibli Nu'mānī

quwwat-i mutakhayyilah, 49
quwwat-i qudsiyah yā malikah-i nubuwah, 42
raf'-i yadayn, 59 n.
Rahmat Allah Sayānī, 103
rā'y, 75
al-Rāzī, 25, 26, 29, 30, 38, 41, 42
realities, ultimate, 42 Reformation, Lutheran, 45
resurrection, 53
Revelation, 24, 43, 49, 117
ribā, 87
riwāyat bi al-ma'ni, 65, 66
Rizvi, S.A.A., 82 n.
rūh, 49
rūhāniyāt, 46
Rūmī, 26, 32, 50-56, 117
ru'yā, 17

Safarnāmah, 81, 84 n., 93, 95 n.
Safran, Nadav (Egypt in Search of Political Community), 2 n.
“Sar Āghā Khān kā Turkon se Khiṭāo,” 97 n.
Sawāniḥ, 9 n., 10 n., 12 n., 16 n., 51 n., 53 n.
Sawāniḥ Mawlānā Rām (Shibli), 4, 52
separatism, Hindu-Muslim, 102
Sha'ā'ir Allāh, 71, 72
al-Shāfi'ī, 44, 59 n.
“Shāhr Āshob-i Islām,” 96
“Shāh Wali Allāh's Attempt to Reconcile the Schools of Fiqh” (Mi'rāj Muḥammad), 73 n.
Shāmi, see Ibn 'Ābidīn
shari'ah, 44, 48, 55, 65, 69-71, 91
shar'-o millat, 97
Shaykh al-Ishrāq, 24, 25, 48
Sherwani, H.R.K., 99 n.

Shibli Nāmah (S.M. Ikram), 58 n., 95 n
Simla Deputation, 196
Sirat al-Nu'mān, 58, 64
siyāsat al-'āmmah, 70
Smith, W.C., Islam in Modern History, 1, 4 n., 77 n., 114 n.; Modern Islam in India, 101 n.
Somnath, 111
Spencer, 35
sūd, 87
sufis, 55
Sulaymān Nadwī, Sayyid, 26 n., 36 n., 77 n., 79 n., 87 n., 89 n., 90 n., 92 n., 99 n., 100 n., 102 n., swarāj, 114

Tadkirah-i Shams al-'Ulamā, 58 n.
Tadkirah-i Wiqār, 99 n., 102 n.
tafaqquh, 65
tafsīr, 28-30, 117
Tafsīr (Rāzī), 29
tahdhīb al-akhlāq, 6-7
tahdhīb al-nafs, 70
Tahrir al-Mar'ah, 81, 82
Tahrir Fi Usūl al-Tafsīr (Sayyid Ahmad Khān), 3 n.
tajarrud 'an al-māddah, 53
takfir, 28
tamāthul-i khayālī, 49 taqlīd, 45
taṣawwuf, 50
ta'wīl, 39, 47
Tilak, 114
Tripoli, 96
Tufayl Ahmad Manglorī, Musalmānon kā Roshan Mustaqbil, 102 n.
Turkey, 96, 97 n., 101, 111
Turks, 83, 87, 97 n.
al-Ṭūsī, Nizām al-Mulk, 92

Index

‘Ulamā’, 8, 27, 33, 79, 82
“Ulūm al-Qur’ān,” 18 n.
‘Umar, 62, 64, 67-69
Umayyads, 21
ummah-i awlād, 68
Unity (of God), 15, 21, 33, 37, 46, 71 ‘urf, 76
wahdāt al-wujūd, 54, 117
wahy, 17;—matlu', ghayr matlū', 65
Wali Allāh, Shāh, 6, 31-33, 38, 40, 42-44, 49, 67-72
waqf-i awlād, 87
wāqi’iyyat, 5
Wiqār al-Mulk, 110;—“Hindostān
Men Musalmānōn Kī Ā’indah
Hālat,” 102
wujūd-i hissī, 49
zann-i al-thubūt, 66
zann-i ghālib, 51
*Zill al-Ghamām fi Mas’alat al-
Qir’at Khalf al-Imām*, 57
Zoroaster, 24

*Intellectual Modernism
of SHIBLI NU'MANI*

AN EXPOSITION OF HIS RELIGIOUS AND POLITICAL IDEAS

Mrs. Mehr Afroz Murad

297.20924
M 89 I
310622

Institute of Islamic Culture
2- Club Road, Lahore.